knock-down (nok′doun), a. 1. Such as to knock to the ground; hence, overwhelming; irresistible: as, a knock-down blow; a knock-down argument.

Away with the wishy-washy school of sentiment in which a knock-down argument is thought of with the same horror as a knock-down blow!
J. Wilson, Noctes Ambrosianæ, Dec., 1834.

2. Constructed so as to be readily knocked down or taken apart for convenience in transportation; prepared and kept in separate parts, ready to be put together as a whole.

To make a knockdown wigwam, the framing should be lashed together with ropes or twine, and the bark tied to the rafters with twine. Sci. Amer., N. S., LIX. 187.

★knocker (nok′ėr), n. 1. One who knocks.—2. A spirit or goblin supposed to dwell in mines, and to indicate the presence of rich veins of ore by knocking.

The miners say that the Knocker is some being that inhabits in the concaves and hollows of the Earth, and that it is thus kind to some men of suitable temper, and directs them to the ore by such its knocking.
Hooson, quoted by R. Hunt in British Mining.

3. A knob, bar, or ring of metal attached to an outer door, by knocking with which persons seeking admittance can attract the notice of the inmates. It is usually so held by a hinge that it can be lifted and allowed to fall against a metal plate or stud, giving a sharp blow. It has now generally given place to the door-bell.

It [the front door] was ornamented with a gorgeous brass knocker, curiously wrought, sometimes in the device of a dog, and sometimes of a lion's head.
Irving, Knickerbocker, p. 167.

One could hardly find a knocker at a door in a whole street after a midnight expedition of these Beaux Esprits.
J. Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 180.

knod†, v. t. A variant of gnod.

knoll[1] (nōl), v. [Early mod. E. also knowl; < late ME. knollen, a more sonorous form of knallen, knullen, and more nearly agreeing with the cognate D. G. knallen = Sw. knalla = Dan. knalde, make a loud noise; ult. imitative: see knell.] I. trans. 1. To ring, as a bell; especially, to ring slowly, for or as for a funeral; toll; knell.

To come in ther propre persones to the counselle house . . . as often as they shallen here the grete belle of the parisshe of Seint Androwe to be knolled by many as diuers tymes, and after that rongen out for the same.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 401.

Me thinkes I heare the clarke,
That knowles the careful knell.
The Aged Louer Renounceth Loue.

Had I as many sons as I have hairs,
I would not wish them to a fairer death:
And so his knell is knoll'd.
Shak., Macbeth, v. 8, 50.

2. To ring or sound a knell for; warn or draw by the sound of a bell.

And his tongue
Sounds ever after as a sullen bell,
Remember'd knolling a departing friend.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., i. 1, 103 (Knight).

Clear from the church-tower clangs the bell,
Knolling souls that would repent
To the Holy Sacrament.
Bulwer, Fridolin (tr. from Schiller).

II. intrans. To sound, as a bell; ring.

If ever [you have] been where bells have knoll'd to church.
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 7, 114.

Remember that your fame
Knowles in th' eare o' th' world: what you doe quickly
Is not done rashly.
Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, i. 1.

knoll[1] (nōl), n. [< knoll[1], v.] The ringing of a bell: as, the curfew knoll.

The far roll
Of your departing voices is the knoll
Of what in me is sleepless.
Byron, Childe Harold, iii. 96.

knoll[2] (nōl), n. [< ME. knol, < AS. cnol, cnoll, a top or summit (of a hill), = MD. knolle, D. knol, knob, protuberance, a turnip, = MHG. knolle, G. knollen, a knoll, clod, lump, knot, = Norw. knoll = Dan. knold, a knoll, = Sw. knöl, a bump; prob. of Celtic origin: < W. cnol, a knoll, hillock, dim. of a more orig. form seen in Gael. cnoc, a hill, knoll, hillock, = Ir. cnoc, a hillock, a turnip (cf. def. 2); perhaps orig. a 'bump,' as in the related noun knuckle, q. v., from the verb represented by W. cnocio, knock, Gael. cnac, crack, etc.: see knock. Hence dial. (Sc.) know[2], q. v., and prob. noll, the head, a dial. or slang word of which the proper spelling knoll was not recognized.] 1. The top or crown of a hill; more generally, a small, gently rounded hill or mount.

The labourers' homes,
A frequent haunt of Edith, on low knolls
That dimpling died into each other.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

2. A turnip. [Prov. Eng.]

knoller (nō′lėr), n. One who tolls a bell.

knolly (nō′li), a. [< knoll[2] + -y[1].] Having knolls; marked by small rounded hills.

Mr. Upham briefly described the belts of knolly and hilly drift which have been traced through Minnesota.
Science, III. 695.

★knop (nop), n. [Formerly also cnop; < ME. knop, knoppe, < AS. cnop* = D. knop, a knob, bud, = OHG. chnopf, cnopf, chnoph, MHG. knoph, knopf, G. knopf = Dan. knop = Sw. knopp, bud, knop, knop, button, stud (cf. Dan. knob, a knot, bend, naut. knot). Also in variant forms knob (q. v.) and knap, ME. cnap, < AS. cnæp = Icel. knappr = Dan. knap, a knop, knob: see knap[2]; cf. also D. knoop = MLG. LG. knōp = MHG. knouf, G. knauf (MHG. dim. knoufel, knöufel), a knob, button. See also knosp.] 1. A small rounded projection; a stud; a button; a knob. [Now only in some specific uses. See below.]

Knoppis fyne of gold enameled.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 7258.

But when our standard was set up,
So fierce the wind did bla', Willie,
The golden knop down from the top Unto ground did fa', Willie.
Up and War Them A', Willie (Child's Ballads, VII. 265).

2†. A bud.

For brode róses and open also

But knoppes wille freshe be Two dayes atte leest or thre.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 1684.

The cedar of the house within was carved with knops and open flowers. 1 Ki. vi. 18.

3. Eccles., a bulb on the stem of a chalice for convenience in holding it. It is found in some of the earliest known chalices.—4. In arch., same as knob.—5. A large tub. [Prov. Eng.]—Knop-and-flower pattern, a name given to a pattern much used in Eastern (especially Persian) decoration, as of pottery, consisting of alternately a solid or compact flower and a minutely divided and delicate one.

knop† (nop), v. t. [< ME. knoppen; < knop, n.] To adorn with buttons, knobs, or projections of any sort.

Highe shoos knopped with dagges.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 7260.

His knopped schon clouted full thykke;
His ton toteden [peeped] out as he the londe treddede.
Piers Plowman's Crede (E. E. T. S.), l. 424.

knopper (nop′ėr), n. [G., a gallnut, < knopf, a knop, knob: see knop.] A kind of gall formed from the immature acorns of Quercus pedunculata and Q. sessiliflora, abounding in Croatia, Styria, etc. These galls are largely used for tanning throughout Austria, and to some extent in Germany. They are also used in dyeing. Also knopper-gall.

knopweed (nop′wēd), n. Same as knapweed, 2.

knor†, n. An obsolete form of knur.

knorned†, a. See knurned.

knorrish (nor′ish), a. [< knor, now knur, + -ish[1].] Knotty; knarry. [Prov. Eng.]

knosp (nosp), n. [< G. knospe, a bud, < MHG. knospe, a knot, knop; akin to knopf, a knop, bud: see knop.] A bud or unopened leaf or flower, or an architectural ornament resembling a bud; a knob. [Rare.]

Thy thousands, trained to martial toil,
Full red would stain thy native soil,
Ere from thy mural crown there fell
The slightest knosp or pinnacle.
★Scott, Marmion, v., Int.

knot[1] (not), n. [< ME. knotte, < AS. cnotta = D. knot = MHG. knotze; cf. OHG. chnodo, chnoto, MHG. knode, knote, G. knoten = Icel. knūtr (for knutr*?) = Dan. knude = Sw. knut, a knot; prob. = L. nodus (for gnodus*), a knot (> E. node, q. v.), these kindred forms being somewhat complicated. Hence knit, and, through Russ. from Icel., knout.] 1. An interlacement of parts of a cord, rope, or any flexible strip, formed by twisting the ends about each other, and then drawing tight the loops thus formed; also, a similar interlacing of two or more cords, threads, etc.; a bunch of threads or thread-like things entangled together.

a, bowline-knot; b, figure-of-eight knot.

Bind up this hair
In any simple knot. Shelley, The Cenci, v. 4.

Specifically—2. A piece of ribbon, lace, or the like folded or tied upon itself in some particular form, used as an ornamental adjunct to a costume, or to a sword, a cane, etc.: as, a knot of ribbon; a breast-knot; a shoulder-knot.—3. Something resembling a knot in its complication, its protuberancy, or its rounded form.

John was now matching several kinds of poppies and field-flowers to make her a present of knots for the day.
Gay, Letter, quoted in Thackeray's English Humourists.

The Queen, who sat
With lips severely placid, felt the knot
Climb in her throat, and with her feet unseen Crush'd the wild passion out against the floor.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

(a) The hard, cross-grained mass of wood formed in a trunk at the insertion of a branch; particularly, the round, gnarly formation resulting from a branch being broken off and the tissues growing around its stump. This stump often decays, or falls out in cutting, leaving a knot-hole.

As knots, by the conflux of meeting sap,
Infect the sound pine and divert his grain
Tortive and errant from his course of growth.
Shak., T. and C., i. 3, 7.

(b) A node in a stem, or any node-like expansion in a stem, pod, etc.

The canes of Egypt, when they newly arise from their bed of mud and slime of Nilus, start up into an equal and continual length, and are interrupted but with few knots.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 838.

(c) An excrescence on a trunk or root; a gnarl or knur. (d) A tuft, as of grass. (e†) A flower-bud.

It [the citron-tree] bore some ripe ones, and some sour ones, some in the knot, and some in the blossom altogether.
Ep. Hacket, Abp. Williams, ii. 88.

(f) In lithol., a small concretion or aggregation of mineral matter, or imperfectly developed crystal, found occasionally in schistose rocks, appearing to be the result of contact metamorphism. Knots of this kind sometimes occur crowded together in large numbers, so as to give a knotty appearance to what otherwise would be a quite smooth slaty surface. Such slate is called knotted slate or schist (in German knotenschiefer). The knots are sometimes simply segregations of ferruginous material around a small fragment of the slate; sometimes more or less distinctly formed crystals, andalusite being the most common mineral thus occurring. This peculiar formation is well shown in the eastern Vosges and in the lake district of England. (g) In mech., same as knote. (h) In arch., same as knob. (i) In brush-making, a tuft of bristles ready to be fastened into a hole in the stock. (j) In anat., a ganglion; a node; a plexus. (k) A defect in flint-glass, consisting of an opaque particle of earthy matter from the furnace, or abraded from the glass-pot, or a particle of glass-gall, or an imperfectly vitrified grain of sand. (l) In phys. geog., an elevated and plateau-like region where several great chains of mountains unite: a term little used by geographers except in describing parts of the chain of the Andes.

The Knot of Pasco, a great ganglion, as it were, of the system [of the Andes].
Sir J. Herschel, Physical Geography, p. 130.

(m) Naut.: (1) A division of the log-line, so called from the series of pieces of string stuck through the strands and knotted at equal distances on the line, being the space between any consecutive two of such knots. When the 28-second glass is used, the length of the knot is 47.3 feet. See log[2]. (2) A nautical mile. The length of a sea-mile varies with the latitude, according to some authorities; but the United States Hydrographic Office and United States Coast Survey have adopted 6,080.27 feet as its constant length, the English Admiralty 6,080 feet. See mile.

In order to remove all uncertainty and to introduce uniformity, this office adopted, several years ago, the value which results from considering the nautical mile as equal to the one sixtieth part of the length of a degree on the great circle of a sphere whose surface is equal to the surface of the earth. This value, computed on Clarke's spheroid, is: One nautical mile = 1853.248 metres = 6080.27 feet, a value which corresponds to the adopted length of the Admiralty Knot = 6080 feet.
Report U. S. Coast and Geod. Survey, 1881, p. 354.

(n) In geom., a universal curve in three-dimensional space, which, upon being brought into a plane by any process of distortion whatever without the crossing of one part through another (that is, without passing through a nodal form), will always have nodes or crossings. A knot differs from a link in being unicursal, while a linking consists of two curves or ovals in space, which, after being brought into a plane by the above process, are always crossed the one with the other; a lacing consists of three which are similarly joined together, independently of any linking of pairs of them. An amphichiral knot is one which is its own perversion—that is, whose image in a mirror does not differ from the knot itself in respect to right- or left-handedness. (o) In Essex, England, eighty rounds of the reel of baize, wool, or yarn. (p) In her., a piece or two or more pieces of cord so intertwined as to form an ornamental figure. There are many forms which were in common use as badges of certain noble families in the middle ages, which have been adopted as bearings in heraldry proper. (q) In lace-making, a small and simple ornament projecting from the outer edge of the cordonnet, a variety of the fleur-volant. (r) Any figure the lines of which frequently intersect each other: as, a garden knot (a parterre).

Heraldic Knots.

1, Lacy knot; 2, Dacre knot; 3, Bowen knot; 4, Wake (Ormond) knot; 5, Stafford knot; 6, knot of Savoy (of the Order of the Annunciation); 7, Harrington or true-love knot; 8, Bouchier knot; 9, Heneage knot.

The pileres weren y-peynt and pulched ful clene,
And queynteli i-coruen with curiouse knottes,
With wyndowes well y-wrougt wide vp o-lofte.
Piers Plowman's Crede (E. E. T. S.), l. 161.

Flowers worthy of Paradise; which not nice art
In beds and curious knots, but nature boon Pour'd forth profuse on hill, and dale, and plain.
Milton, P. L., iv. 242.

Next the streete side, and more contiguous to ye house, are knotts in trayle or grasse worke, where likewise runs a fountaine. Evelyn, Diary, April 1, 1644.

(s) A cluster; a collection; a group.

Not a soul, without thine own foul knot,
But fears and hates thee. B. Jonson, Catiline, iv. 2.

A certain knot of ladies took him for a wit.
Addison, A Beau's Head.

(t) A swirling wave. [Rare.]

A knot of the sea washed our tub overboard, wherein our fish was a-watering. Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 11.

4. A bond of association; a close union or tie: as, the nuptial knot.

His owne two hands the holy knotts did knitt,
That none but death for ever can divide.
Spenser, F. Q., I. xii. 37.

O night and shades!
How are ye join'd with hell in triple knot!
Milton, Comus, l. 581.

5. A difficulty, intricacy, or perplexity; something not easily solved; a puzzle.

It is too hard a knot for me. Shak., T. N., ii. 2, 42.

A man shall be perplexed with knots, and problems of business, and contrary affairs. South, Sermons.

6. The point on which the action or development of a narrative depends; the gist of a matter; the nucleus or kernel.

The knotte why that every tale is told,
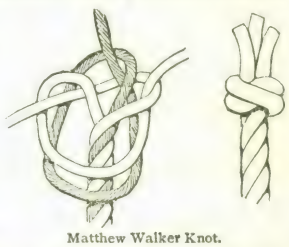
If it be taried til that lust be cold
Of hem that han it after herkned yore,
The savour passeth ever lenger the more,
For fulsomnesse of his prolixitee.
Chaucer, Squire's Tale, l. 393.



How evil an historian are you, that leave out the chief knot of all the discourse. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, ii.

All the while, no doubt, and even as I write the phrase, he [grandfather] moves in my blood, and whispers words to me, and sits efficient in the very knot and centre of my being. R. L. Stevenson, The Manse.

7†. In hunting, one of certain morsels of flesh from the fore quarters of a stag.

Sythen rytte thay the foure lymmes, & rent of the hyde,
Then brek thay the bale, the balez out token,
Lystily forlancyng, & bere of the knot.
Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 1334.

8. A rocky summit. [Prov. Eng.]—Anglers' double knot, a neat and secure knot used in joining gut-lengths. The ends are laid together pointing in opposite directions, and are passed round each other twice. When drawn together, the knot is oblong and the ends may be cut off as close as can be done with a sharp knife without a possibility of their drawing. This knot is indispensable in making leaders for trout-fishing and casting-lines for salmon-fishing. Morris.—Artificers' knot. See artificer.—Bowline-knot, a common form of sailors' knot, in which the loop can be made of any size, and does not jam nor render. See cut under def. 1.—Builders' knot, a clove-hitch. See hitch, 6.—Dacre knot, in her., a knot forming a device or badge used by the Dacre family, and often appearing as a heraldic bearing. See cut under def. 3 (p).—English knot (naut.), a method of tying two rope-ends or pieces of gut together by making an overhand knot in each around the other.—Figure-of-eight knot, a form of knot much used by sailors, shaped like the figure 8. See cut under def. 1.—Flemish knot. Same as figure-of-eight knot.—Gordian knot. See Gordian.—Hard knot, a knot tied in such a manner as not to be easily loosened.—Harrington knot, in her., a knot or pattern made of interlacing bands, usually torsed or twisted like ropes, showing two strands crossing each other saltierwise and passing through a lozenge: a badge of the ancient family of Harrington. Compare cut under fret, in which the interlacing strips are similarly disposed. See cut under def. 3 (p).—Heneage knot, in her., a heart-shaped knot or twist of rope, the badge of the Heneage family. See cut under def. 3 (p).—Herculean knot, a knot which cannot be severed.—Josephine knot, a knot used to join two pieces of thread when both the ends are afterward needed for use. Dict. of Needlework.—Light-wood knot. See light-wood.—Man-rope knot, a knot made on the end of a rope by opening out the strands, and forming a double wall and double crown.—Matthew Walker knot (naut.), a knot made by interlacing the strands at the end of a rope in the manner shown in the cut, used especially for the lanyards of the lower rigging, to keep the end from drawing through the hole in the deadeye: named from the inventor.—Order of the Knot, a military order of short duration, founded at Naples in the fourteenth century.—Overhand knot. See the cut below.—Porters' knot, a pad for supporting burdens on the head.

Matthew Walker Knot.

To a Coblers Aul, or Butcher's Knife,
Or Porter's Knot, commend me;
But from a Souldier's Lazy Life,
Good Heaven pray defend me.
Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [II. 201.

One of the publishers to whom Johnson applied for employment . . . exclaimed, "You had better get a porter's knot, and carry trunks." Macaulay, Samuel Johnson.

One Thames Street porter would take the whole seven and their bundles on his knot.
O'Keefe, Fontainebleau, i. 1.

a, overhand knot; b, square or reef knot; c, granny's-knot.

Square knot, a knot used in tying reef-points, so formed that the ends come out alongside of the standing parts and the knot does not jam. Also called reef-knot.—Surgeons' knot, a square or reef knot: used in tying a ligature around a cut artery.—To cut the knot. See cut.—To tie with St. Mary's knot†, to hamstring. [Old slang, North. Eng. and Scotch.]

He has tied them a' wi' St. Mary's knot,
A' these horses but barely three.
Dick o' the Cow (Child's Ballads, VI. 72).

True-love or true-lovers' knot. (a) A kind of double knot, made with two bows on each side interlacing each other, and with two ends: the emblem of interwoven affections or of engagement.

I'll knit it up in silken strings,
With twenty odd-conceited true-love knots.
Shak., T. G. of V., ii. 7, 46.

They grew till they grew unto the church top,
And then they could grow no higher;
And there they tyed in a true lovers knot,
Which made all the people admire.
Fair Margaret and Sweet William (Child's Ballads, II. 144).

knotfulness (not'fûl-nes), n. In geom., the number of knots of less knottiness of which a given knot is built up. See knot[1], 3 (n).

As soon as we come to 8 folds we have some knots which may preserve their knottiness even when this condition [taking the crossings alternately over and under] is not fulfilled. These ought, therefore, to be regarded as proper knots and to be included in the census as new and distinct types. This is a difficulty of a very formidable order. It depends upon the property which I have called knotfulness. Tait, Trans. Roy. Soc. of Edin., XXXII. iii. 504.

knot-grass (not'gràs), n. 1. A weed of almost world-wide distribution, Polygonum aviculare: so called from the numerous nodes in its stems and its thickly spreading habit. It is a tough trailing and branching plant, common in trodden ground, and often carpeting dooryards, etc. (Also called knotweed, goose-grass, cow-grass, doorweed, etc.) An infusion of it was formerly supposed to retard bodily growth, whence Shakspere calls it "hindering knot-grass."

Get you gone, you dwarf;
You minimus, of hindering knot-grass made.
Shak., M. N. D., iii. 2, 329.

We want a boy extremely for this function Kept under for a year with milk and knotgrass.

knowlache†, knowlage†, n. Middle English forms of knowledge.

knowleche†, n. and v. A Middle English form of knowledge.

knowledge (nol′ej), n. [< ME. knowlege, knowleche, knouleche, knowliche, knolych, knowlage, knowlache, knawlage, knawlache, etc., knowledge, < knowen, know, + -leche, assibilated form of -leke, < Icel. -leikr, -leiki = Sw. -lek, a suffix used to form abstract nouns, = AS. -lāc, in wedlāc, wedlock, prob. identical with lāc, play, gift: see lake[2], loke[4]. The term. -leche became assimilated, through -lache, to the suffix -age.] 1. The state of being or of having become aware of fact or truth; intellectual recognition of or acquaintance with fact or truth; the condition of knowing. Subjectively considered, knowledge implies clear conviction or a consciousness of certainty; but this consciousness does not constitute knowledge, and may be associated with error.

Knowledge is the perception of the agreement or disagreement of two ideas.
Locke, Human Understanding, IV. i. 2.

The essentials of Cognition, or Knowledge, may be summed up thus:—First. To know any single thing, we must be conscious of it as Differing from some things, and as Agreeing with other things. To this extent knowledge involves only what belongs to Sensation and Perception. Secondly. When Knowledge amounts to Affirmation there are usually at least two things taken notice of: and not only so, but the couple must be farther viewed, as coming under a third property, namely one of the Universal Predicates of Propositions—for example, Co-existence or Succession. "The sun is a luminous body," "night follows day"—are higher combinations than the mere knowledge of "Sun," "Night," "Day"; they unite simple or elementary cognitions into affirmations or propositions; and the binding circumstance is one of the comprehensive generalities called Co-existence and Succession. Thirdly. Into these Affirmations there must enter the active state or disposition termed Belief (or Disbelief).
A. Bain, Emotions and Will, p. 592.

We have but faith; we cannot know;
For knowledge is of things we see;
And yet we trust it comes from thee,
A beam in darkness: let it grow.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, Int.

With that certainty which is absolutely objective, i. e. with knowledge, psychology has no direct concern; it is for logic to furnish the criteria by which knowledge is ascertained. J. Ward, Encyc. Brit., XX. 83.

2. A perception, judgment, or idea which is in accord with fact or truth; that which is known.

"Not all," quod she, "madame, that may not be;
ffor yet I haue no knowlage whiche he is."
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 730.

I'll make this new report to be my knowledge;
I'll say I know it; nay, I'll swear I saw it.
Beau. and Fl., Philaster, iii. 1.

All gouernment of action is to be gotten by knowledge, and knowledge best, by gathering many knowledges.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

For knowledges are as pyramides, whereof history is the basis: so of Natural Philosophy the basis is Natural History; the stage next the basis is Physic; the stage next the vertical point is Metaphysic.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii.

This knowledge of the cause of a phænomenon is different from . . . the knowledge of that phænomenon simply as a fact; and these two cognitions or knowledges have, accordingly, received different names. The latter . . . is called historical or empirical knowledge; the former is called philosophical, or scientific, or rational knowledge.
Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., iii.

3. Acquaintance with things ascertained or ascertainable; acquired information; learning.

Ignorance is the curse of God,
Knowledge the wing wherewith we fly to heaven.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 7, 79.

I think by far the most important bill in our whole code is that for the diffusion of knowledge among the people.
Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 45.

4. Practical understanding; familiarity gained by actual experience; acquaintance with any fact or person: as, a knowledge of seamanship; I have no knowledge of the man.

Thys is gret meruell
That ye take a wif vnknow what is sche,
Neither haue knewlich of hir gouernail,
Ne of hir kinrede; strange is without fail!
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 844.

The dog straight fawned upon his master for old knowledge. Sir P. Sidney.

Huram sent him by the hands of his servants ships, and servants that had knowledge of the sea. 2 Chron. viii. 18.

This gentleman 's a stranger to my knowledge;
And, no doubt, sir, a worthy man.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, iii. 1.

The wisest of Pagan Philosophers said that the greatest Learning was the Knowledge of one's self.
Howell, Letters, ii. 77.

5. Specific information; notification; advertisement.

Ye schall warne the Maister and Wardens thereof, and han ynforme wher thei be, as fer forth as ye schall have knolych. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 317.

I pulled off my headpiece, and humbly entreated her pardon, or knowledge why she was cruel. Sir P. Sidney.

The coast . . . is set with small watch-towers, which with smoke by day, and fire by night, do give knowledge unto one another of . . . suspected enemies.
Sandys, Travailes, p. 10.

6. Cognizance; notice; recognition.

Why have I found grace in thine eyes, that thou shouldest take knowledge of me, seeing I am a stranger? Ruth ii. 10.

A state's anger
Should not take knowledge either of fools or women.
B. Jonson, Catiline, iv. 6.

Of your love too and care for us here, we never doubted; so are we glad to take knowledg of it in that fullnes we doe.
Robinson, quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, [p. 163.

But hir sekenes was of some other thinge.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 277.

Knowltonia (nōl-tō′ni-ä), n. [NL. (R. A. Salisbury, 1796), named after Thomas Knowlton, once curator of the Botanic Garden at Eltham.] A genus of ranunculaceous plants, of the tribe Anemoneæ, closely related botanically to Adonis and Anemone, but differing from both in its berry-like carpels. The 5 species are South African perennial herbs with the habit of the Apiaceæ, having rigid root-leaves ternately decompound, those of the stem often reduced to bracts or wanting, and greenish or yellowish flowers on irregularly umbellate peduncles. They are acrid plants, and their property of producing blisters has long been known. The bruised leaves are used at the Cape of Good Hope as a substitute for cantharides. The sliced root is said to be still more powerful. Reichenbach made this genus the type of a subsection of the Anemoneæ.

Knowltonieæ (nōl-tō-nī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Reichenbach, 1837), < Knowltonia + -eæ.] A subsection of the Ranunculaceæ-Anemoneæ, typified by the genus Knowltonia.

knowman†, n. A perverted form of gnomon. Florio.

known (nōn), p. a. [Pp. of know[1], v.] Perceived; understood; recognized; familiar; especially, when used absolutely, familiar to all; generally understood or perceived.

This is not onely Reason but the known Law of the Land. Milton, Eikonoklastes, xi.

Death is the knownest and unknownest thing in the world, that of which men have the most thoughts and fewest meditations. S. Ward, Sermons, p. 53.

It is matter of great consolation to an envious person when a man of known honour does a thing unworthy of himself. Steele, Spectator, No. 19.

The range of the known embraces much more than the sensible. G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, I. i. § 27.

To make known, to announce; communicate; mention.

know-nothing (nō′nuth″ing), n. and a. [< know[1], v., + obj. nothing.] I. n. 1. One destitute of knowledge; one who is ignorant, or who professes ignorance, of anything; an ignoramus.—2. [cap.] A member of the so-called American party (which see, under American). See also quotation.

An elaborate code of signals and passwords was adopted, and all operations of the "Americans" were wrapped in profound secrecy. If a member of the order was asked about its practices or purposes, he answered that he knew nothing about them, and "Americans," for that reason, soon came to be called Know Nothings.
T. W. Barnes, Thurlow Weed, p. 224.

II. a. Very ignorant.

Their knowing and know-nothing books are scatter'd from hand to hand. Tennyson, Despair.

Know-nothingism (nō′nuth″ing-izm), n. [< Know-nothing, 2, + -ism.] The doctrines or principles of the Know-nothings.

Know-Nothingism was, therefore, something more than a lamentable aberration; the republic was seriously menaced by it, and it violently shook one of its main pillars. H. von Holst, Const. Hist. (trans.), p. 105.

knowperts (nō′pėrts), n. [Perhaps for knopwort; cf. knapperts.] The crowberry, Empetrum nigrum. See crowberry. [Scotch.]

Knoxia (nok′si-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus), named after Robert Knox, who lived twenty years in Ceylon and wrote a history of the island.] A genus of rubiaceous plants, forming with Pentanisia the tribe Knoxieæ. The genus is specially characterized by a 4-toothed calyx, a 2-lobed stigma, and a dilated funiculus to the ovules. There are 8 or 9 species, inhabiting India, Malaysia, New Guinea, and tropical Australia. They are herbs or undershrubs with ovate or lanceolate opposite leaves fascicled in the axils, and stipules connate with the petioles in a sheath. The flowers are small, pink or lilac, and usually sessile along the branches of a cyme which lengthens after flowering. The plants are ornamental in cultivation, and have been introduced into England as greenhouse plants.

Knoxieæ (nok-si′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1873), < Knoxia + -eæ.] A tribal division of the natural family of plants Rubiaceæ, consisting of the genera Knoxia and Pentanisia, being mostly tropical herbs or undershrubs of the old world, with connate stipules and terminal inflorescence.

knt. An abbreviation of knight.

knub (nub), n. [Also nub, q. v.; a var. (= LG. knubbe, > G. knubbe, knuppe, a knob) of knob.] 1. A blunt end or piece; a small lump.—2. See the extract.

One-seventh of this weight [of common cocoon] is pure cocoon, and of that not more than one-half is obtainable as reeled silk, the remainder consisting of surface floss and of hard gummy husk or knub. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 60.

knub† (nub), v. t. [A var. of knob, or from the same ult. source; cf. knap[1].] To beat; strike with the knuckles.

knuccheț, n. A Middle English form of knitch.

knuck (nuk), n. [Abbr. of knuckle.] Same as ★knuckle, 3. [New Eng. or colloq.]

knuckle (nuk′l), n. [< ME. knokel, knokil, < AS. cnucl*, enucel* (Somner, Benson, Lye, Bosworth; not authenticated) = OFries. knokele, knokle* = MD. knokkel, D. kneukel, knokkel = MLG. knokel, LG. knukkel, knüchel = MHG. knöchel, knüchel, G. knöchel = Dan. knogle, knokkel = Sw. dial. knjokel, knuckle, a joint: dim. of a simple form not found in E., namely, MD. knoke, a knuckle, knob, knot, D. knok, knook, knuckle, a bone, = MHG. knoche, G. knochen, a bone, = Sw. knoge = Dan. kno, knuckle (cf. Icel. knúi, knuckle); cf. W. cnwc, a bunch, knob, knot, cnuch, a joint; prob. ult. akin to knock, and thus akin also to E. knack, knag[1]: see knack, knock.] 1. The joint of a finger, especially that between the metacarpal bone and the first phalanx.—2†. The knee or knee-joint.

Thou, Nilus, wert assigned to stay her pains and travails past,
To which, as soon as Io came with much ado, at last
With weary knuckles on thy brim she sadly kneeled down.
Golding.

3. A joint, especially of veal, consisting of the part of the leg called the knee. It is the part of the animal which corresponds to the hock of a horse, or the human heel, together with more or less of the leg above this joint.

I never prosper
With knuckles o' veal, and birds in sorrel sops.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, ii. 4.

4†. The joint of a plant; a node.

Divers herbs . . . have joints or knuckles, as it were stops in their germination; as have gilly-flowers, pinks, fennel, corn, reeds and canes. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 589.

5. A joint of cylindrical form, with a pin as axis, as that by which the straps of a hinge are fastened together.—6. In ship-building, an acute angle on some of the timbers.

This angle, which is continued around the stern until the curvature of the buttock breaks continuously into the inward inclination of the ship's side, is termed the knuckle. Thearle, Naval Arch., § 107.

7. pl. Pieces of metal, usually brass (hence specifically known as brass knuckles), worn by lawless persons over the knuckles to protect them in striking a blow, and also to make a ★blow more effective. See knuckle-duster.

knuckle (nuk′l), v.; pret. and pp. knuckled, ppr. knuckling. [< knuckle, n.] I. trans. To touch or strike with the knuckle; pommel. [Rare.]

I need not ask thee if that hand, when armed,
Has any Roman soldier mauled and knuckled.
H. Smith, Address to a Mummy.

The light porter . . . knuckling his forehead as a form of homage. Dickens, Hard Times, ii. 1.

II. intrans. To bend the knuckles; hold the knuckles (that is, the hand) close to the ground, in playing marbles: usually with down. A player is required to knuckle down in order to keep him from gaining undue advantage by "hunching" nearer the mark.

As happy as we once, to kneel and draw
The chalky ring, and knuckle down at taw.
Cowper, Tirocinium, l. 307.

He [Kemble] could stoop to knuckle down at marbles with young players on the highway: and to utter jokes to them with a Cervantic sort of gravity.
Doran, Annals of Eng. Stage, II. xix.

To knuckle down. (a) See above. (b) To apply one's self earnestly, as to a task; engage vigorously, as in work. (c) To submit, as in a contest; give up; yield.

So he knuckled down again, to use his own phrase, and sent old Hulker with peaceable overtures to Osborne.
Thackeray, Vanity Fair, xlii.

To knuckle under. Same as to knuckle down (c).

But when the upper hand is taken . . . it naturally happens that we knuckle under, with an ounce of indignation. R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, liv.

knuckle-bow (nuk′l-bō), n. That part of the guard attached to the hilt of certain swords which covers the fingers, reaching in a curved form from the cross-guard or shells, where the blade joins the handle, to the pommel, or nearly to the pommel. The knuckle-bow was introduced at the time of the complete disappearance of the steel gauntlet, and is frequent in the rapier of the seventeenth century and in the small sword of the eighteenth century. It is usually made fast to the pommel, but in rare cases its own stiffness supports it without reaching the pommel. Also knuckle-guard. See cut under hilt.

knuckled† (nuk′ld), a. [< knuckle, n., + -ed[2].] Jointed.

It [the reed or cane] hath these properties; that it is hollow, [and] that it is knuckled both stalk and root.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 656.

knuckle-deep† (nuk′l-dēp), adv. Up to one's knuckles; with the whole hand in; so as to be deeply implicated or involved. Davies. [Rare.]

You shall find St. Paul (1 Cor. vi. 5) offend against this bill, and intermeddle knuckle-deep with secular affairs by inhibiting the Corinthians very sharply for their chicanery, pettifoggery, and common barretry in going to law one with another. Bp. Hacket, Abp. Williams, ii. 170.

knuckle-duster (nuk′l-dus″tėr), n. Same as knuckle, 7. It is said, upon English authority only, that "this brutal invention is American, but has been made familiar in England in police cases between the officers and sailors of American vessels" (S. De Vere, Americanisms, p. 320).

knuckle-guard (nuk′l-gärd), n. Same as knuckle-bow.

knuckle-joint (nuk′l-joint), n. 1. An anatomical joint forming a knuckle, as one of the joints of the fingers; in a whale, the shoulder-joint.—2. In mech., any flexible joint formed by two abutting links.

knuckle-timber (nuk′l-tim″bėr), n. Naut., the foremost top-timber of the bulkheads.

knuckly (nuk′li), a. [< knuckle + -y[1].] Having prominent knuckles or finger-joints.

Blue veined and wrinkled, knuckly and brown,
This good old hand is clasping mine.

> Drayton, Shepherd's Garland.

ko, v. i. An obsolete or dialectal contraction of quoth.

koa (kō'ä), n. [Hawaiian.] A common and very valuable forest-tree of the Sandwich Islands, Acacia Koa. Its wood is excellent for fuel and for construction, and especially for fine cabinet-work, its polished surface being handsomely marked with wavy lines. It is much used for veneers. The bark is employed for tanning.

koala, koolah (kō'ä-lä, kō'lä [the nat. pron.]), n. [Native Australian koolah, a kangaroo.] A marsupial mammal of Australia, Phascolarctos cinereus. It is related to the wombats and phalangers, but is now placed in another family, Phascolarctidæ. It is an arboreal animal, whose general aspect recalls both the sloths and the bears. The form is stout and clumsy, with no visible tail, a short snout, bushy ears, thick woolly pelage, and feet formed like hands for grasping limbs of trees. In the fore foot two of the digits oppose the other three, and in the hind the inner toe serves for a thumb. The fur is ashy-gray. The koala has one cub at a time, which is carried about by the parent for a while after leaving the pouch. The animal feeds on leaves and twigs of trees. The natives pursue it in the trees, where it is despatched with a club, or shaken off a branch to be killed or disabled by the fall. Also called native sloth, native bear, and kangaroo-bear.

kob (kob), n. [Senegal (Wolof) koba : > NL. Kobus.] An African antelope of the genus Kobus; a water-antelope, of which there are several distinct species known by different names. The sing-sing, Antilope koba or Kobus sing-sing, is a large species of western Africa, reddish-brown above and white below, with annulated horns forming together a lyre-shaped figure. The water-buck, K. ellipsiprymnus, is a large animal of southern and eastern Africa, of a brown color, with a white ellipse on the rump. It stands 12 or 13 hands high, and has horns 2 feet or more in length. Other kobs are the leche-antelope, K. leche; the pookoo, K. vardoni; and the nsunnu, K. leucotis. See Kobus, 1.

kobalt, n. See cobalt.

kobang, koban (kō'bang), n. [Jap., lit. 'small division,' < ko, little, + ban (= Chin. fan), a cutting or division.] An oblong gold coin with rounded corners, formerly current in Japan. It was about 2 inches long and 1¼ inches broad, weighed originally about 200 grains troy, and was consequently worth from 15 to 16 bu, though in the early days of foreign trade with Japan it was valued at only 4 bu (equivalent to one riō or ounce of silver). This unfavorable rate of exchange having almost drained the country of its gold, the government became alarmed, and after adopting several palliative measures ultimately reduced the weight of the kobang to 51 grains troy, with an average fineness of 0.650. Also spelled cobang. Compare ōbang.

Kobang. (Size of the original.)

kobaoba (kō-ba-ō'bä), n. [African: cf. kob.] The long-horned white rhinoceros of Africa, Rhinoceros (Atelodus) simus.

kobellite (kō'bel-īt), n. [After Franz von Kobell, a German mineralogist and poet (1803–82).] A mineral of a blackish lead-gray or steel-gray color. It is a sulphid of antimony, bismuth, and lead.

kobold (kō'bold), n. [= D. kobold = Sw. Dan. kobolt, < G. kobold, < MHG. kobolt, a spirit of the hearth, a fairy, goblin; perhaps < MHG. kobe, G. koben, a room, cabin (= AS. cofa, E. *cove*1), + -walt (reduced to -olt, -old, as in herold = E. herald) (= AS. -wealda), ruler, < walten, wield, rule; the sense being equiv. to AS. cofgod, in pl. cofgodas, lares, penates, household gods—a word containing the same initial element (E. *cove*1). Less prob. < ML. cobalus, a goblin, demon, < Gr. κόβαλος, an impudent rogue: see goblin. Hence prob. cobalt, q.v.] In Germany, an elemental spirit, or nature-spirit of the earth, corresponding to this element as undines, sylphs, and salamanders respectively correspond to water, air, and fire; a gnome or goblin. Kobolds are supposed to inhabit mines and other underground places. When regarded as present in houses, the kobold is more frequently called a poltergeist ('racket-sprite'), in allusion to its mischievous pranks.

Kobresia (kō-brē'si-ä), n. [NL. (Willdenow, 1805), named after Von Kobres of Augsburg, who collected a rich cabinet of natural history which was purchased by King Ludwig of Bavaria.] A genus of glumaceous plants of the family Cyperaceæ, tribe Cariceæ, type of an old division Kobresieæ. It is characterized by having the spikelets always disposed in a terminal spike and the leaves frequently cespitose at the base of the stem. Eight species have been recognized, inhabiting the northern part of North America and the northern and mountainous parts of Europe and Asia. They are low cespitose perennials with grass-like leaves and often leafless scapes, closely resembling sedges.

Kobresieæ (kō-brē-sī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lestiboudois, 1819), < Kobresia + -eæ.] A division of the Cyperaceæ including, besides Kobresia, a number of old genera (Catagyna, Diaphora, etc.), most of which are now embraced in Scleria, Kobresia, or Eriospora, that is, in the tribe Sclericæ, but some, as Cpcticla, belong to Cyperus and other genera not in that tribe.

Kobus (kō'bus), n. [NL. (J. E. Gray, 1846), < kob, q. v.] 1. A genus of African antelopes of the family Bovidæ, subfamily Antilopinæ, forming part of a small group sometimes named Cervicaprinæ; the water-bucks. It includes a number of water-antelopes called kobs. Cervicapra is a synonym.—2. [l. c.] An antelope of the genus Kobus; a kob.

Kochia (kō'ki-ä), n. [NL. (Roth, 1800), named after W. D. J. Koch, director of the Botanical Garden at Erlangen.] A genus of chenopodiaceous plants of the tribe Camphorosmeæ, characterized by a turbinate perianth, the lobes broadly winged in the fertile flowers. About 35 species are known, inhabiting central Europe, temperate and southern Asia, northern and southern Africa, and Australia, besides an indigenous species in western North America. They are herbs, often woody at the base, with alternate entire leaves and inconspicuous flowers, some of which are hermaphrodite, others entirely female, the fertile expanding into horizontal wings in the fruit. Two Australian species, K. aphylla and K. sedifolia, are evergreen shrubs 2 to 3 feet high, and are cultivated under the name of broom-cypress. Other Australian species, K. eriantha, K. pubescens, and K. villosa, are valuable fodder-plants in the arid regions of that continent. The last-named is called the cotton-bush on account of its downy adventitious excrescences, and is highly valued. The American species, K. Americana, partakes of this quality, and affords excellent winter grazing in the West when no grass can be obtained; in common with another related plant, Eurotia lanata, it there receives the name of white sage.

Kochieæ (kō-kī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Kochia + -eæ.] In Endlicher's botanical system, a subtribe of the tribe Chenopodicæ, family Chenopodiaceæ, characterized by the absence of floral bracts, and embracing 13 genera, a number of which are now regarded as synonyms, and those still retained fall under several of the modern tribal divisions. One of these genera, Cryptocarpus, is excluded from the family and referred to the Nyctaginaceæ.

kodak (kō'dak), n. [An arbitrary word invented as a trade-mark.] A hand-camera, of a special make, designed for taking instantaneous photographs; hence, any similar camera.

koel (kō'el), n. [Hind. kōil, Prakrit koelo, < Skt. kokila, cuckoo: see cuckoo.] A cuckoo of the genus Eudynamys, as the Indian koel, E. orientalis. Also koïl, kuil.

Kœleria (kē-lē'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Persoon, 1805), named after Georg Ludwig Köler, professor at Mainz, and author of a work on grasses.] A genus of grasses falling within the tribe Festuceæ or fescue-grasses, distinguished by a spike-like cylindraceous or somewhat interrupted panicle, and more or less hyaline-scarious flowering glumes. They are annual or perennial cespitose grasses with narrow flat or almost setaceous leaves. There are about 15 species, chiefly natives of Europe, temperate Asia, and northern Africa, but a few occur in other parts of the world, notably one species, K. cristata, in North America from Ontario to British Columbia and Texas, as well as in Europe and Asia. This widely distributed species is a valuable "bunch-grass" of the arid regions of western America, where it is called June grass. The closely allied K. glauca is used to advantage in Australia in binding coast-sand.

Kœlreuteria (kel-rō-tē'ri-ä), n. [NL. (Laxmann, 1772), named after Joseph Gottlieb Kölreuter, professor of natural history at Karlsruhe.] A genus of ornamental Chinese trees with bladder-like fruit, belonging to the family Sapindaceæ, and type of Radlkofer's tribe Kœlreuterieæ, distinguished by its 5 valvate sepals, 3 to 4 spreading petals, inflated loculicidal capsule, pinnate leaves, and ample, terminal, many-flowered, branching panicles of yellow flowers. Two species are now recognized, one of which, K. paniculata, a small tree with coarsely toothed leaflets a, perfect flower; b, male flower; c, fruit cut longitudinally, showing two seeds.

and large bladdery pods, is extensively planted in parks in both Europe and America, where it is hardy, and very handsome in leaf, flower, and fruit.

Kœlreuterieæ (kel-rō-tē-rī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Radlkofer, 1888), < Kœlreuteria + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Sapindaceæ, typified by the genus Kœlreuteria, and embracing in addition the genera Stocksia and Erythrophila.

Kœnigia (kē-nig'i-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1767), named after Johann Gerhard König, a pupil of Linnæus, and later a traveler and collector of plants.] A genus of polygonaceous plants, type of the tribe Kœnigieæ, being delicate dwarf herbs with hyaline bracts, small obovate entire leaves, and minute flowers, chiefly fascicled among the upper leaves, the lobes of the perianth and stamens generally three. Two or three closely allied species occur, one widely distributed throughout the arctic and subarctic regions, the others confined to the Himalaya mountains.

Kœnigieæ (kē-ni-gī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1880), < Kœnigia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Polygonaceæ, of which Kœnigia is the type. They are low herbs with dichotomous inflorescence, the flowers capitate or densely fascicled in the forks. It embraces besides Kœnigia five other genera, all natives of California, one of which is also found in Chile.

koft†, a. Same as cof.

koff (kof), n. [< D. kof, a two-masted vessel.] A small Dutch sailing vessel.

koffle, n. See coffle.

koftgar (koft'gär), n. [Hind.: see koftgari.] In India, an inlayer of steel with gold. See koftgari.

koftgari (koft'gar-i), n. [Hind. koftgarī, < kuftan, to beat, + -garī, making, < -gar, doer.] Inlaid East Indian metal-work in steel and gold: a variety of damaskeening. The pattern is drawn out on the surface of the steel, and a wire of soft pure gold is hammered in. The chief center of the art is Gujerāt in the Panjāb. Also called kofi- or kuft-work.

koft-work (koft'wėrk), n. Same as koftgari. Art Jour., 1884, p. 198.

Kogia (kō'ji-ä), n. [NL.] A genus of pygmy sperm-whales, of the subfamily Physeterinæ, and family Physeteridæ. They have from 9 to 12 lower teeth, and 2 rudimentary upper teeth, or none; the symphysis menti less than half the length of the jaw; the cervical vertebræ ankylosed; and 7 cervical, 13 or 14 dorsal, and 30 to 31 or 32 lumbar and caudal vertebræ. Several nominal species, from 7 to 10 feet long, are described, but not satisfactorily distinguished from K. breviceps of southern seas.

Kohathite (kō'hath-īt), n. [< Kohath (see def.) + *-ite*2.] In Jewish hist., a descendant of Kohath, the second son of Levi. The Kohathites were one of the three great families of the Levites (Num. iii. 17–37), and had charge of bearing the ark and its furniture in the march through the wilderness.

kohl (kōl), n. [Also kuhl; Ar. koh'l: see alcohol.] A powder used in the East from time immemorial in the toilet, to darken the orbits of the eyes, etc., properly consisting of finely comminuted sulphid of antimony.

Kohl is also prepared of the smoke-black produced by burning the shells of almonds.
E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 41.

Eyes pencilled with kohl seem larger and more oblong.
R. F. Burton, tr. of Arabian Nights, VII. 250, note.

kohlrabi (kōl-rä'bi), n. [< G. kohlrabi, kohlrabe, formerly kolrabi, after It. cavolo rapa: see cole-rape. The G. form kohlrabi simulates the It. pl. cavoli rape, or the L. rapi, gen. of rapum. The plant is also called in pure G. kohlrübe, < kohl (< L. caulis), cabbage, + rübe, = L. rapum, turnip.] The turnip-stemmed cabbage, or turnip cabbage, a variety of Brassica oleracea. It is a frequently cultivated variety of the cabbage-plant, in which the stem above the ground swells into a large bulb-like formation which serves the purposes of a turnip, resembling in quality the Swedish variety, or rutabaga.

koilon (koi'lon), n. [< Gr. κοίλον, neut. of κοῖλος, hollow: see cœliac, etc., *cave*1.] In the anc. Gr. theater, the auditorium; the cavea. See cuts under cavea and diazoma.

kok1†, n. A Middle English form of *cock*1.

kok2†, v. and n. A Middle English form of *cook*1.

kok3 (kok), n. An Indian rat, Mus kok.

kokil (kō'kil), n. [Skt. kokila, Hind. koklā: see koel, cuckoo.] A large green-billed cuckoo of India, Zanclostomus tristis. Also called malkoha.

kokoke†, n. An obsolete form of cuckoo.

kokoon (kō-kön'), n. A tree of the genus Kokoona.

Kokoona (kō-kō'nä), n. [NL. (Thwaites, 1853), from the Cingalese name of the species that grows in Ceylon.] A genus of large tropical dicotyledonous trees growing mainly on the islands of Ceylon and Borneo, belonging to the family Celastraceæ, distinguished from related genera by a 3-celled ovary and winged seeds destitute of aril or albumen. These trees have a yellow bark, opposite coriaceous leaves, and small yellowish-lurid flowers with twisted petals, arranged in axillary panicled cymes. The fruit is a 3-sided and 3-celled capsule, 1 to 3 inches long. K. Zeylanica, the kokoon or kokoona-tree of Ceylon, is used by the inhabitants, who make a kind of snuff from the bark for the cure of headache, and express an oil from the seeds which they burn in lamps. The other two species, natives of Malacca and Borneo, respectively, are little known.

kokum-butter, kokum-oil, n. See cocum-butter.

kokwold†, n. A Middle English form of *cuckold*1.

kola-nut, kolla-nut, n. See còla-nut.

Kolarian (kō-lā'ri-an), a. [< Koli + -arian.] Relating to the Kols, an aboriginal people of northeastern India speaking a language distinct from both Dravidian and Aryan.

Koli (kō'li), n. [Hind.: see coolie.] A member of an aboriginal tribe in the hills of central India, whither they were driven by the early Aryan settlers. They are scattered, as cultivators and laborers, throughout southern India, but have preserved their original language, customs, and superstitions.

kolinsky (ko-lin'ski), n. [Russ. Kolinski, of Kola, Russia.] A furriers' name for the red sable, or Siberian mink, Mustela sibirica, or its fur. The animal is about 15 inches long, with a bushy tail 8 or 10 inches long, the fur uniformly buff or tawny, somewhat paler below, varied with black and white on the head. The fur is known as Tatar sable; it is usually dyed to imitate other kinds. The tail is used for artists' pencils.

★Also applied to the fur of other species.

kolloxyline (ko-lok'si-lin), n. Nitro-cellulose soluble in alcohol and ether; collodion.

komeceras, komoceras (kō-mes'-, kō-mos'e-ras), n. [NL., < Gr. κομή, the hair, + κέρας, horn.] In mammal., a horn or pseudo-horn formed of matted or felted hair of the skin covering the core. This horn is annually developed and shed, as in the American prong-horn, Antilocapra americana. J. E. Gray.

kon1†, v. An obsolete spelling of *con*1 for *can*1.

kon2†, v. t. An obsolete spelling of *con*2.

kong, n. See *kang*1.

kongsbergite (kongs'bèrg-īt), n. [< Kongsberg (see def.) + *-ite*2.] A variety of silver amalgam, containing 95 per cent. of silver, found at Kongsberg in Norway.

Koninckia (kō-ning'ki-ä), n. [NL., named after Prof. de Koninck of Liège.] 1. A genus of corals of the family Favositidæ. Edwards and Haime, 1849.—2. Same as Koninckina.

Koninckina (kō-ning-kī'nä), n. [NL. (Suess, 1853), < Koninckia + *-ina*1.] The typical genus of Koninckinidæ. K. leonhardi is a species from the Upper Trias of the Austrian Alps.

Koninckinidæ (kō-ning-kin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Koninckia + -idæ.] A family of fossil brachiopods, based on the genus Koninckina.

koninckite (kō'ningk-īt), n. [After Prof. de Koninck of Liège.] A hydrated iron phosphate from Visé in Belgium.

konistra (kō-nis'trä), n. [< Gr. κονίστρα (see def.), < κονίζειν, κονίειν, cover with dust, < κόνις, dust, = L. cinis, ashes: see cinereous.] In the anc. Gr. theater, the orchestra; properly, a circular area between the stage and the auditorium or koilon, raised slightly above the level of a surrounding space or passage, which was usually paved and coped with stone. The thymele stood in the middle of the konistra, which was so called because its floor consisted of ashes or ashes and earth compounded, beaten down to a hard and smooth surface. This disposition of the ancient theater was usually changed, under the Romans, for an even pavement of stone; but notable examples survive, as at Epidaurus and Sicyon. See cut under diazoma.

könleinite (kèn'līn-īt), n. [G. könleinit: < Könlein, its discoverer.] A soft reddish-brown hydrocarbon occurring in folia or in grains with brown coal at Uznach in Switzerland. Also könlite.

koppa (kop'ä), n. [Gr. κόππα, < Phen. (Heb.) qōph.] A letter of the original Greek alphabet, ϙ, analogous in form and corresponding in position and use to the Phenician and Hebrew koph and the Latin Q, q. See episemon, 2. The kappa (K, κ) was substituted for it in the words in which it had been used, but the sign was retained as a numeral with its ancient value of 90.

koppite (kop'īt), n. [After Prof. Hermann Kopp of Heidelberg.] A rare mineral, related to pyrochlore in composition, found at Schelingen in the Kaiserstuhl, Baden.

Kopp's law of boiling-points. See boiling-point.

kopra, koprah, n. See copra.

Kopsia (kop'si-ä), n. [NL. (Blume, 1823), named after a Dutch botanist, Jan Kops, professor at Utrecht.] An untenable name for Calpicarpum, a genus of tropical old-world trees or shrubs, of the Apocynaceæ, or dogbane family, tribe Plumericæ, having a hypocrateriform or salver-shaped corolla, calyx destitute of glands, corolla-lobes twisted and overlapping to the right, opposite leaves, and white or pink flowers in short terminal cymes. It was made by Don the type of his tribe Kopsieæ. Six species are known, native in Farther India and the Malayan peninsula and archipelago. Calpicarpum fruticosum (Cerbera fruticosa of Ker) is very ornamental in cultivation.

Kopsieæ (kop-sī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Don, 1838), < Kopsia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Apocynaceæ. See Kopsia.

Koran (kō-rän' or kō'ran), n. [Also rarely Coran, Quran, formerly also Core; with the Ar. article, Alkoran, Alcoran (q. v.); = Turk. Pers. qurān, < Ar. qurān, qorān, book, reading, < qarā, read.] The book which contains the religious and moral code of the Mohammedans, and by which all their transactions, civil, legal, military, etc., are regulated. It consists of revelations uttered by Mohammed at intervals during many years, and written down on loose leaves, the collection of which was completed after his death in 114 surahs or chapters. Its style is regarded as the standard of classical Arabic.

kraken (krä'- or krā'ken), n. [Also sometimes kraaken; < Dan. kraken, < Norw. krake, a fabled sea-monster: little used in Norw., but appar. a particular use of krake, a pole, stake, post, a stunted crooked tree, a hook, also a stunted animal or person, = Icel. kraki, a pale, stake, post, = Dan. krage, a climbing-pole, = Sw. krake, a stunted horse; prob. ult. akin to E. crook.] A mythical sea-monster said to appear at times off the coast of Norway. The popular notion of the kraken dates back at least to the time of Pontoppidan (1698–1764), who wrote a description of it. One of the giant squids, as a cephalopod of the genus Architeuthis, might furnish a reasonable basis for the myth.

> To believe all that has been said of the Sea-Serpent or the Kraken would be credulity; to reject the possibility of their existence would be presumption.
> Goldsmith, Animated Nature, iv. 3.

> Then, like a kraken huge and black,
> She crushed our ribs in her iron grasp!
> Longfellow, The Cumberland.

> The kraaken or great sea snake of the Norwegian fjords.

Krameria (krā-mē'ri-ạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus), named after J. G. H. Kramer, an Austrian physician and botanist.] A genus of American herbs or undershrubs, which has been variously classed by different authors, some referring it to the Polygalaceæ and others classing it among leguminous plants. Dumortier in 1829 made it into a distinct family, the Krameriaceæ, and the present tendency is to follow this classification. It has 4 or 5 nearly equal sepals, 5 unequal petals, a 1-celled ovary containing 2 ovules, a globose indehiscent echinate fruit, and seeds destitute of albumen. The flowers are borne in terminal racemes. The number of species recognized by recent authors is about 13, all growing in the warmer parts of America, but ranging from southern Florida, Kansas, and Texas to Chile. K. triandra, the ratany, a shrub found in the mountainous parts of Peru, Bolivia, and Chile, from 3,000 to 8,000 feet altitude, produces the medicinal ratany-root of commerce (see ratany), and all the species are said to possess intensely astringent properties. K. pauciflora, from Mexico, is an ornamental shrub.

kriegspiel (krēg'spēl), n. [< G. krieg, war, + spiel, game.] A game designed to teach the principles of strategy and tactics. Two opposing combatant forces are represented by blocks made to the scale of the map upon which the game is played. These blocks represent the tactical units of each arm. It is played by the commander of each force and is supervised by an umpire. Until the forces are actually in sight of each other, they are so screened that neither commander sees the operations of the other. Each move or change of position corresponds to a given interval of time. As chance is an element of warfare, it is represented in the game by the throwing of dice and reading the consequences on a table of possibilities.

krieker (krē'kėr), n. [< G. kriecher, a creeper, croucher, < kriechen, creep: see creep.] A name in Rhode Island, Long Island, and New Jersey of the pectoral sandpiper, Tringa maculata. Also called squat-snipe and squatter.

Krigia (krig'i-ạ), n. [NL. (Schreber, 1791), named after David Krig, who collected plants in Maryland near the beginning of the 18th century.] A genus of North American plants, of the family Cichoriaceæ, type of Schultz's tribe Krigieæ, with yellow flowers, usually on leafless scapes, a few-bracted involucre, many-ribbed achenes, and pappus of 5 to 8 small chaffy scales, alternating with as many bristles. They are low herbs with milky juice and radical leaves in a rosette on the ground, with the aspect of small-flowered dandelions. The genus embraces only five species, all of which are found in the United States, belonging to three sections—K. Virginica, a common little plant of eastern North America from Canada to Kansas, being the type. K. Dandelion, with much larger flowers and globose tubers, was formerly placed in a distinct genus, Cynthia.

Kyrie (kir'i-e), n.; pl. Kyries (-ez). [Short for Kyrie eleïson.] 1. The Kyrie eleïson, especially in its western form (with Christe eleison), and the repetitions collectively, as used at the beginning of the Roman mass or as at the beginning of the Anglican communion office.—2. The musical setting of these words.

Kyrie eleïson (kir'i-e e-lā'i-son). [Gr. Κύριε ἐλέησον, Lord, have mercy: Κύριε, Lord; ἐλέησον, aor. impv. of ἐλεεῖν, have mercy or pity: see Christe eleison.] 1. Literally, Lord, have mercy! a brief petition, founded on nearly identical Scriptural phrases (for example, Ps. cxxiii. 3, Mat. xx. 30), used as a response in the primitive liturgies and in the eucharistic and other offices of Oriental churches to the present day. In the Latin Church Kyrie eleison (thrice) is followed by Christe eleison (thrice), and this again by Kyrie eleison (thrice). The formulary is always said in this Greek wording, but the intermediate Christe eleison is unknown to the Eastern Church. The Oriental Kyrie is used in the irenica at the beginning of the liturgy and in other litanies. The Western Kyrie (a remnant of the irenica) is used by the Roman Church at mass just after the introit, and also in the breviary offices and in litanies. In the Sarum missal it also occurred near the beginning of the service, and this use of it is represented in the communion office of the Book of Common Prayer by the responses after the commandments, "Lord, have mercy upon us, and incline our hearts to keep this law." In the same book it occurs in the form "Lord, . . . Christ, . . . Lord, have mercy upon us," in the litany, and before the collect for the day at morning and evening prayer. This is also called the lesser litany.

2. The first movement or division in a musical setting of a Roman Catholic mass or the Anglican communion office, the text being the petitions above mentioned.

kyriolexy (kir'i-ō-lek-si), n. [< Gr. κυριολεξία, the use of literal expression, < κύριος, having authority, authorized, regular, + λέξις, speaking: see lexicon. Cf. cyriologic.] The use of literal as opposed to figurative expressions, or of words in clear and definite senses. [Rare.]

kythe†, n. A Middle English form of kith.

kythe†, v. See kithe.

kyxt, n. A Middle English form of kex.

★ 1. The twelfth letter and ninth consonant of the English alphabet. It had a similar place in the Latin, Greek, and Phenician alphabets, from which the character has come to us. The scheme of its forms in those alphabets, with the Egyptian characters from which they are perhaps ultimately derived (see A), is as follows:

Egyptian. Hieroglyphic. Hieratic. | Phenician. | Early Greek and Latin.

The l-sound is made with the tongue in the same general position against the roof of the mouth as d and t and n (see these letters), and hence is called, like them, a dental (or gingival, or lingual, or tongue-point) sound. Its characteristic peculiarity of utterance is that it involves a breach of the close d-position at the side or sides of the tongue, the intonated breath escaping there, while the tip of the tongue remains in contact. This breach may be made on either side of the tongue, or on both sides at once: the habits of different individuals, and perhaps of different communities, varying in this regard. Other l-sounds, agreeing with ours in the lateral breach of mute contact, but differing in the position of the tongue, are found in some other languages: as, the palatal l of French and Italian (the French l mouillé, now mostly converted into a simple y-sound; the Italian gl), the lingual or cerebral l of Sanskrit, and so on. L is the most sonorous and continuable, or most vowel-like, of our consonant-sounds; and hence it has come, by the loss of an accompanying vowel, to have itself the value of a vowel in a very large number of English unaccented syllables — especially after a mute, as in fickle, wriggle, bottle, noddle, apple, babble; less often after consonants of other classes, as in muscle, muzzle, raffle, devil, and colloquially in such as kernel, gunnel, pommel. The sign l never has any other than its own proper sound; but it is silent in a few words, as balm, half, talk. In the recent history of our language the sound is a peculiarly stable one, hardly exhibiting transition into any other; more anciently, and in other tongues, it exchanges sometimes with d (as Latin lacrima, Greek δάκρυ), but especially with r (thus, in Sanskrit, the l is to a large extent a later alternative to an r); in many French words it appears converted into u (as maux, plural of mal, beau beside bel, belle, and so on); in Italian, after mutes, into i, as piano, Latin planus, etc. In virtue of its general phonetic character, l is a semivowel (so far as that term is admitted), and is often classed as such, along with r, or with r and y and w. More popularly, it is ranked as a "liquid," with m and n and r, nothing more being implied in the classification (a loose and unscientific one) than its special sonorousness and continuability.

2. A symbol — (a) in chem., for lithium: also Li; (b) in Roman numerals, for 50, and with a line drawn above it (L) for 50,000. — 3. An abbreviation — (a) [l. c.] in music, of la (in solmization); (b) of Latin; (c) in stage-directions, of left; (d) [l. c.] of liber, a book, as a division of a literary work; (e) [l. c. or cap.] of libra, pound sterling, when written after the figures (when before the figures, it has the conventional form £): as, 100*l.* = £100; (f) [l. c.] in a ship's log-book, of lightning; (g) [l. c.] in references, of line: as, Milton, Lycidas, l. 72; (h) [l. c.] of logarithm; (i) [l. c.] in astron., of longitude (l denoting the heliocentric and λ the geocentric longitude); (j) [l. c.] of lege; (k) [cap. or l. c.] in anat., of lumbar: used in vertebral formulæ. — The three L's (naut.), lead, latitude, and lookout: a phrase used by seamen to signify that a careful use of the first (in sounding), a knowledge of the second, and the vigilant performance of the third will prevent a vessel from running ashore.

L² (ell), n. [Prop., as a word, spelled ell; from the letter L.] 1. A part of a house or other structure projecting at a right angle from the main body, so as to form with it the figure of the letter L: as, the building has an L of 20 feet.

> The milk-pans tilted to sun against the underpinning of the L. Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 134.

2. A rectangularly bent pipe-connection. E. H. Knight. Also ell in both senses.

la¹ (lä), interj. [Also law; var. of lo, < AS. lā, interj.: see lo.] An expression of mild admiration, wonder, or surprise, and formerly of asseveration: as, O la! that is strange. [Now vulgar.]

> Truly, I will not go first; truly, la! I will not do you that wrong. Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1, 322.

La! miss, why, it is witchcraft. C. Reade, Love me Little, i.

La you†, behold; see there.

> La you now, you hear! Shak., W. T., ii. 3, 50.

la² (lä), n. [See gamut.] In solmization, the syllable used for the sixth tone of the scale — that is, the submediant. In the major scale of C this tone is A, which is therefore sometimes called la, especially in Italy and France. Abbreviated l.

la³ (lä). [See le.] The feminine form of the definite article in French, occurring in some ★names and phrases used in English.

La. In chem., the symbol for lanthanum.

laager (lä'gėr), n. [D., var. of leger, a camp: see *lecguer*², lager.] In South Africa, an encampment; an inclosure for temporary defense ★formed of the wagons of a traveling party.

laager (lä'gėr), v. t. [< laager, n.] To arrange in such a way as to form a defensive inclosure; arrange so as to form a laager: as, to laager wagons. [S. African.]

lab† (lab), v. [< ME. labben, < OD. labben, blab, tell tales: cf. G. labbe, lip, mouth. Cf. *blab*¹, babble.] I. intrans. To blab; babble; tattle.

> Of hir tonge a labbyng shrewe is she. Chaucer, Prol. to Squire's Tale, l. 10.

II. trans. To blab.

> Thyng that wolde be pryue publisshe thow hit neuere, Nother for loue labbe hit out ne lacke hit for non enuye. Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 39.

lab (lab), n. [< ME. labbe; from the verb.] A blabber; a tattler; a telltale. [Prov. Eng.]

> I am no labbe, Though I it say, I am nought leef to gabbe. Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 323.

Labadism (lab'a-dizm), n. [< Labadie (see Labadist) + -ism.] The doctrines and practices of the Labadists.

Labadist (lab'a-dist), n. [< Labadie (see def.) + -ist.] A follower of Jean de Labadie (1610–74), a Jesuit, afterward a mystic Protestant preacher in France and Holland. The Labadists were Christian communists. Among their tenets were denial of the obligation of sabbath observance, on the ground that life is a perpetual sabbath; belief in the direct influence of the Holy Spirit; and belief in marriage as a holy ordinance valid only among believers, the children of the regenerate being born without original sin. The sect disappeared about the middle of the eighteenth century.

Labarraque's fluid or solution. See fluid.

labarum (lab'a-rum), n. [LL., in LGr. λάβαρον, also λάβωρον, λάβουρον; origin obscure; according to Baillet (Dict. Celtique), < Basque labarva, a standard; according to Larramendi (Dicc. trilingue), of Cantabrian origin, < lauburu, anything with four heads or limbs, such as the cruciform framework of a military standard. Cf. LL. cantabrum, a standard, a variant reading of labarum in some passages, neut. of Cantaber, Cantabrian, pl. Cantabri, the Cantabrians: see Cantabrian.] 1. A Roman military standard adopted by the later emperors as the imperial standard. It consisted of a staff or lance carrying a purple banner on a cross bar. This banner usually bore the effigy of the general or emperor; but Constantine the Great, after his conversion, placed upon it, woven in gold, the cross and the monogram (chrisma) or emblem of Christ, ☧ or ☧, consisting of the Greek letters XP (Chr), standing for Christ. In later times the name was given to the monogram itself, or to the cross in the monogram.

Ecclesiastical Labarum.

2. A standard or banner of similar form, borne in ecclesiastical processions of the Roman Catholic Church. — 3. Figuratively, a moral standard, guide, or device.

> It is now the Pagans who have seized the labarum of duty and self-sacrifice. F. P. Cobbe, Peak in Darien, p. 5.

Labatiella (la-bā-ti-el'ä), n. [NL., named after a French botanist, Jean Baptiste Labat.] A genus of American trees of the family Sapotaceæ, having a 4-parted calyx, 5 fertile and 5 abortive stamens, a 4-celled ovary, and fleshy fruit. Six species are known, natives of the West Indies and Brazil. The type species, L. sessiliflora (Labatia sessiliflora of Swartz), is a native of San Domingo.

labbe²†, la-bee†. A contraction or corruption of let be. See *let*¹. Chaucer.

> Hee'l purchase induction by simony,
> And offers her money her incumbent to be.

labefy (lab'ē-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. labefied, ppr. labefying. [< L. labefacere, cause to totter, shake, weaken, < labare, totter, give way, + facere, do, make.] To weaken or loosen; enfeeble; impair. [Rare.]

label¹ (lā'bel), n. [< ME. label, labell, labelle, labiel, < OF. label, labeau, also, with an inserted liquid or nasal, lambel, lembel, lambeau (ML. reflex labellus, labella, lablellus, lambellus), a rag, tatter, shred, F. lambeau, shred, piece, strip, flap, with dim. suffix, < OHG. lappa, MHG. lappe, G. lappen, a rag, shred, = AS. læppa, lappa, a lap, flap, fold: see *lap*². Cf. lapel, ult. = label.] 1†. A small loosely hanging flap; specifically, a pendant like a broad ribbon hanging from a head-dress; a lappet.

> And a knit night-cap made of coarsest twine,
> With two long labels button'd to his chin.
> Bp. Hall, Satires, IV. ii. 24.

The Priests' habits. — Long robes of white taffeta; long white heads of hair; the High-Priest a cap of white silk shag close to his head, with two labels at the ears. Beaumont, Masque of Inner-Temple.

2. In her.: (a) One of the ribbons that hang down from a miter or the electoral crown. See infula, 3 (b). (b) A fillet resembling a barrulet with three or more pendent drops or points, which were originally straight with parallel sides, but are now usually shaped like a dovetail. It is used as a bearing, but especially as a difference, as in cadency, to indicate the oldest son. Some authorities say that the label when used for cadency should have seven points while the great-grandfather of the bearer is alive, five while his grandfather is alive, and three while the father lives. In nearly all cases the label, whether a bearing or a difference, has an odd number of points. These points are also called lambeaux. In a very few cases the label is borne bendwise. A label of three (or more) points crossed has, instead of the ordinary lambeaux, small crosses pointing downward, which may be Latin crosses reversed or Greek crosses. A label of three (or more) pomegranates pendent has, instead of lambeaux, rounded fruit represented as burst open. A label of three (or more) tags pendent has, instead of lambeaux, strips intended to represent the parchment ribbons to which seals are affixed in ancient documents. A label with the points erect, or a label reversed, is seldom used by itself, but in connection with an ordinary label, in which case the blazon is a label counterposed with another, the points erect, or two labels indorsed, or more rarely bars-gemel patté. See lambeau. Also called file and lambel.

Label of three points.

The said Sir William said on his oth, in the tenth yeare of Henrie the fourth, that before the times of Edward the third the labell of three points was the different appropriat and appurtenant for the cognizance of the next heire.
Holinshed, Rich. II., an. 1390.

3. A slip of paper or any other material, bearing a name, title, address, or the like, affixed to something to indicate its nature, contents, ownership, destination, or other particulars.

This label on my bosom. . . .
Luc. Read, and declare the meaning.
Shak., Cymbeline, v. 5, 430.

4. A narrow slip of parchment or paper, or a ribbon of silk, affixed to a diploma, deed, or other formal writing, to hold the appended seal.

Ere this hand, by thee to Romeo seal'd,
Shall be the label to another deed.
Shak., R. and J., iv. 1, 57.

5. In law, a paper annexed to a will by way of addition, as a codicil.—6. A small reserved space in a work of art, or the like, forming a panel or cartouche, used for containing a name, monogram, or other mark for identification.—7. In medieval arch., a projecting tablet or molding over a door or window. See dripstone, 1. Also called label-molding.—8. A long, thin brass rule, with a small sight at one end and a centerhole at the other, commonly used with a tangent line on the edge of a circumferentor, to take altitudes, etc.

Then haste thou a labell, that is shapen like a rule, saue that it is strait and hath no plates on either ende.
Chaucer, Astrolabe.

9†. Border; verge; marge.

On Ascension Eve, May 15th, being in the town of Dover (standing as it were on tip-toes, on the utmost edge, brink, and label of that land which he was about to surrender), King John, by an instrument or charter, . . . granted to God, and the church of Rome, . . . the whole kingdom of England and Ireland.
Fuller, Ch. Hist., III. iv. 13.

labellum (lā-bel′um), n.; pl. labella (-ä). [L., dim. of labrum, a lip: see labrum.] 1. In bot., one of the three divisions of an orchidaceous corolla, differing from the others in shape or direction, and not seldom spurred; the lip. Theoretically it is the petal nearest the axis, but by a half-twist of the ovary it becomes the outer petal, nearest the bract. The term is applicable to similar petals in other flowers. Also label.

L, labellum of (1) Cypripedium hirsutum and (2) Lysias orbiculata.

2. In entom., a part of the mouth of an insect, by some considered to be the epipharynx. In Diptera the labellum is one of a pair of tumid lobes terminating the theca of the proboscis.

label-machine (lā′bel-ma-shēn″), n. A name sometimes applied to stamping-, embossing-, and printing-machines used in making labels and tags.

labent (lā′bent), a. [< L. laben(t-)s, ppr. of labi, fall, slide. Cf. labile, lapse.] Sliding; gliding. [Rare.]

Labeo (lā′bē-ō), n. [NL., < L. labeo, one who has large lips, < labium, lip: see labium.] 1. In Cuvier's system of classification, a genus of cyprinoid fishes.—2. In entom., a genus of hymenopterous parasites of the proctotrypid subfamily Dryininæ, having the occiput deeply concave, and vertex and neck separated by a sharp angle. There are several species, three European and six North American. The genus was founded by Haliday in 1833.

Labia[1] (lā′bi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. λαβή, a handle, or λαβίς, a handle, forceps, < λαμβάνειν, λαβεῖν, take. Cf. labis.] A genus of earwigs of the family Forficulidæ, having the body short and the antennæ with fewer than twelve joints. L. minor is the little earwig, a European species found in manure-heaps and hotbeds. Leach, 1815.

labia[2], n. Plural of labium.

labial (lā′bi-al), a. and n. [= F. labial = Sp. ★Pg. labial = It. labiale, < ML. labialis, pertaining to the lips, < L. labium, lip: see labium.] I. a. 1. In anat. and zoöl., pertaining to the lips or to a lip-like part; situated on or by a lip; having a lip-like character, as in shape, position, or office: as, a labial vessel or nerve; a labial fold or process.—2. In entom., pertaining to the labium, or lower lip of an insect.—3. Formed by the lips, as a sound. See II., 1.

The Hebrews have been diligent in it, and have assigned which letters are labiall, which dentall, which gutturall.
Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 198.

4. Giving forth tones produced by the impact of a stream of air upon a sharp edge or lip: applied to musical instruments such as the flute or the flue-pipes of an organ.—Labial appendages. Same as brachial appendages (which see, under brachial).—Labial glands. See gland.—Labial palpi, in entom., two organs, each consisting of from one to four joints, attached to basal lobes on the sides of the ligula or to the front margin of the mentum. See cuts under Hymenoptera, Insecta, and mouth-part.—Labial pipe, in music, an organ-pipe with lips; a flue-pipe.—Labial segment, that primary body-ring which in insects bears the labium or united second maxillæ. The genæ, occiput, and cervical sclerites have been variously supposed to represent this segment, which in spiders is transferred to the thorax. See postoral.

II. n. 1. A letter or character representing an articulate sound which in speaking is accompanied by a proximate or complete closure of the lips. The labials in English are the mutes p, b, the nasal m, and the fricative f, v (usually made between lips and teeth, and hence called more exactly labiodentals); and the semivowel w and vowels oo (ȯ) and o, as involving a rounding of the lips, are often ranked in the same class. 2. In herpet., one of a series of plates or scales which lie along the edge of the lips, especially in Ophidia, those of the upper lip being the superior labials, those of the lower lip the inferior labials.—3. In entom., one of the labial palpi.

Labiales (lā-bi-ā′lēz), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1833), pl. of ML. labialis, labial: see labial.] In Lindley's earlier system of botanical classification (1833), a group of plants in the cohort Personatæ, embracing the orders Labiatæ, Verbenaceæ, Myoporineæ, and Selagineæ, in all of which the corolla is more or less labiate. In his later system the Labiales are embraced chiefly in his Echiales.

labialism (lā′bi-al-izm), n. [< labial + -ism.] A tendency to labial pronunciation — that is, to change articulate sounds to labials or to labiodentals; labialization.

In one set [of cognate words] we see the phenomenon of labialism, in the other assibilation, but no touch of labialism.
Encyc. Brit., XIII. 810.

labialization (lā″bi-al-i-zā′shon), n. [< labialize + -ation.] The act or process of labializing; conversion to a labial.

The phenomena of palatalization and labialization.
Trans. Amer. Philol. Ass., XVI. 57.

labialize (lā′bi-al-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. labialized, ppr. labializing. [< labial + -ize.] To make labial; give a labial character to; change to utterance with the lips.

A tendency to labialize back vowels.
Amer. Jour. Philol., V. 515.

There is reason for believing that this labializing tendency is very old—as old indeed as the Indo-European language itself.
Encyc. Brit., XIII. 810.

labially (lā′bi-al-i), adv. In a labial manner; by means of the lips.

Labiatæ (lā-bi-ā′tē), n. pl. [NL. (Bernard Jussieu, 1759), fem. pl. of labiatus, lipped: see labiate.] The mint family, a very important and extensive family of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants, with a labiate corolla, and a four-lobed ovary, changing to four seed-like monospermous fruits. This family contains about 160 genera and nearly 3000 species, mostly herbs, undershrubs, or shrubs, rarely arborescent, with opposite or whorled leaves, usually square stems, and a thyrsoid or whorled inflorescence. They are spread throughout the world, being most strongly represented in the Mediterranean and eastern regions, but abounding in all temperate latitudes. Many of the species are valued for their fragrance, as lavender and thyme; others for their stimulating qualities, as mint and peppermint; others as aromatics, as savory, basil, and marjoram; several are used as febrifuges, as the Ocimum viride of Sierra Leone. The name Labiatæ, not being derived from that of any genus in the family, must, by the present rules of nomenclature, be changed. That of Menthaceæ is therefore substituted, based on the typical mint genus Mentha.

labiate (lā′bi-āt), a. and n. [= F. labié = Sp. Pg. labiado = It. labiato, < NL. labiatus, lipped, < L. labium, lip: see labium.] I. a. Lipped; having parts which are shaped or arranged like lips. (a) In bot.: (1) Lipped; nearly always, two-lipped: the same as bilabiate: said of a gamopetalous corolla or gamosepalous calyx. Compare labiose. (2) Pertaining to the Labiatæ (Menthaceæ). (b) In anat. and zoöl., formed like a lip; labial in shape, office, or appearance. (c) In entom., having thickened, fleshy margins: applied to an orifice, as the end of the proboscis of a house-fly.

Labiate Corolla of Prunella vulgaris. a, corolla, seen from the side; b, same laid open, front view.

II. n. A plant of the family Labiatæ.

labiated (lā′bi-ā-ted), a. [< labiate + -ed[2].] Same as labiate.

Labiatifloræ (lā-bi-ā-ti-flō′rē), n. pl. [NL., fem. pl. of labiatiflorus: see labiatiflorous.] In bot., according to de Candolle, Gray, and others, a series of composite plants. The flowers are mostly hermaphrodite, and the corolla is divided into two lips. It was practically regarded by Lindley and Endlicher as a suborder, and is coextensive with the tribe Mutisiceæ.

labiatiflorous (lā-bi-ā-ti-flō′rus), a. [< NL. labiatiflorus, < labiatus, labiate, + L. flos (flor-), flower.] Having the flowers with labiate corollas: said only of the Labiatifloræ.

labidometer (lab-i-dom′e-tėr), n. [< Gr. λαβίς (λαβίδ-), a forceps (see labis), + μέτρον, a measure.] In obstet., a scale adapted to the handles of the forceps, which indicates the distance of the blades from each other when applied to the head of the child. Dunglison.

Labidura (lab-i-dū′rą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of labidurus*, < Gr. λαβίς (λαβίδ-), a holder, forceps, + οὐρά, tail.] A suborder of Orthoptera, distinguishing the Forficulidæ alone from other orthopterous insects: a synonym of Euplexoptera and of Dermaptera in a limited sense.

labiella (lā-bi-el′ą), n.; pl. labiellæ (-ē). [NL., dim. of L. labium, a lip: see labium.] In Myriapoda, a median single or multiple piece of the deutomala, situated between the malulellæ. A. S. Packard, Proc. Amer. Philos. Soc., June, ★1883, p. 200.

labile (lab′il), a. [= OF. and F. labile, < L. labilis, apt to slip, transient, < labi, fall, slip: see labent.] Unstable: as, a labile compound.

The prevalent view that an enzyme acts as a catalyzing agent and that the action of a catalyzer is the formation of a labile intermediate product which instantly decomposes, restoring the catalyzer to its original condition.
★ Science, April 3, 1903.

lability (lā-bil′i-ti), n. [= OF. labilete, < ML. labilita(t-)s, instability, < L. labilis, apt to slip: see labile.] The quality of being labile; instability; proneness to lapse; instability of form or nature.

labimeter (lā-bim′e-tėr), n. An erroneous form of labidometer.

labiodental (lā″bi-ō-den′tal), a. and n. [< L. labium, lip, + den(t-)s, tooth: see dental.] I. a. Formed or pronounced by the coöperation of the lips and the teeth.

II. n. An articulate sound produced by the coöperation of the lips and the teeth, or the letter or character representing such sound. The labiodentals are f and v.

labiose (lā′bi-ōs), a. [< L. labium, lip, + -ose.] In bot., having the (distinct) petals so arranged as to imitate a labiate corolla.

labipalp (lā′bi-palp), n. [< NL. labipalpus, < L. labium, lip, + NL. palpus, a feeler: see palp.] A labial palp or feeler of an insect or a mollusk.

labipalpus (lā-bi-pal′pus), n.; pl. labipalpi (-pī). [NL.] Same as labipalp.

labis (lā′bis), n. [MGr. LGr. λαβίς, a spoon, Gr. a holder, handle, forceps, tongs, < λαμβάνειν, λαβεῖν, take.] In the Greek and other Oriental churches, a small spoon, usually of silver, and with a cruciform handle, used to administer the eucharistic elements (the species of bread dipped in that of wine: see intinction) to the laity. The name is derived from the fact that the Greek word labis (λαβίς) is used in the Septuagint in the passage Isa. vi. 6 for the tongs with which the angel took the live coal from off the altar and gave it to the prophet, the 'live coal' being a frequent name in early Christian times for the eucharist. Before it was applied to the spoon, this name was given to the hand or fingers of the communicant. The labis is not in ordinary use in the Armenian Church. Also called cochlear and eucharistic spoon. See spoon.

labium (lā′bi-um), n.; pl. labia (-ä). [L., a lip, also labrum, a lip, prob. akin to E. lip: see lip.] 1. In anat. and zoöl., a lip or lip-like part. Specifically—(a) In anat.: (1) Either lip, upper or under, of the mouth, respectively called labium superiore and labium inferiore. (2) Either lip, inner or outer, on each side of the vulva, respectively called labium internum and labium externum: generally named in the plural—the former, right and left, being the labia minora or nymphæ; the latter, right and left, being the labia majora. (3) Either lip, upper or lower, of the grooved border of the spiral lamina of the cochlea: the upper is called labium vestibulare, from its relation to the scala vestibuli; the latter, labium tympanicum, from its relation with the scala tympani. (b) In entom., specifically, the lower lip of an insect, the upper being called the labrum. It is morphologically the third pair of gnathites united together on the median line, and believed to correspond to the second pair of maxillæ of a crustacean. The labium is a composite organ, whose composition varies much in different groups of insects. Hence there is great confusion in the names of the parts of which it is composed. The term is now applied to the whole under lip, which may or does consist of parts named (1) stipes, mentum, and palpiger, the palpiger itself bearing the lingua, paraglossæ, and palpi labiales; or (2) submentum, mentum, and ligula, the last bearing the glossa, paraglossæ, and labial palps. See these terms, and cuts under mouth-part.

It is hardly open to doubt that the mandibles, the maxillæ, and the labium answer to the mandibles and the two pairs of maxillæ of the crustacean mouth.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 343.

(c) In Arachnida, the shield forming the floor of the mouth, which in spiders is very conspicuous, and is often, but incorrectly, called the labrum. (d) In Arthropoda generally, the lower lip, attached to the mentum; a coalesced second pair of maxillæ, forming the lower part of the mouth; the metastoma, as of a crustacean. See cut under Astacidæ.

The resemblance between the labium and a pair of maxillæ which have coalesced is obvious.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 347.

(e) One of the lips or labiate prolongations of the neuropodium of a polychætous worm, between which is the aperture of the trichophore. (f) In conch., the inner or columellar lip of a univalve shell, the outer lip being called the labrum. See cut under univalve. (g) The lip of an organ-pipe. See lip.

2. In bot.: (a) The lower or anterior lip of a bilabiate corolla. (b) In Isoëtes, a lip-like structure formed by the lower margin of the foveola. —3. [cap.] A genus of ichneumon-flies, with one small New Guinean species, L. bicolor. Brullé, 1846.—Labia cerebri, the lips of the brain; the margins of the inner surface of the two hemispheres, overlapping the corpus callosum like lips, each forming the border of the gyrus fornicatus.

lablab (lab′lab), n. [Ar. lablāb.] The Egyptian or black bean, Dolichos Lablab, native to India, widely cultivated, and naturalized in most warm countries. The species as named includes several varieties, formerly treated as species of a genus Lablab, as L. vulgaris; also L. ★perennans, the white China lablab.

labor[1], labour (lā′bor), n. [The second spelling is still prevalent in England; early mod. E. labour, < ME. labour, labowre, labor (?), < OF. labor, labur, labour, labeur, F. labeur = Sp. labor = Pg. lavor = It. labore, < L. labor, labos (labōr-), labor, toil, work, exertion; perhaps remotely akin to robur, strength: see robust.] 1. Work done by a human being or an animal; exertion of body or mind, or both, for the accomplishment of an end; effort made to attain useful results, in distinction from exercise for the sake of recreation or amusement.

Sleep that knits up the ravell'd sleave of care,
The death of each day's life, sore labour's bath.
Shak., Macbeth, ii. 2, 38.

What is obtained by labour will of right be the property of him by whose labour it is gained. Johnson, Rambler.

Death is the end of life; ah, why Should life all labour be?
Tennyson, Lotos-Eaters, Choric Song.

Labour, I should say, is any painful exertion of mind or body undergone partly or wholly with a view to future good. Jevons, Pol. Econ., v.

2. Specifically, bodily toil; physical exertion for the sake of gain or reward; the use of muscular strength for the satisfaction of wants, in distinction from purely mental exertion; in economics, all routine exertion, physical or mental, undertaken primarily for the production of a valuable commodity or service. Skilled labor is that employed in arts and handicrafts which have to be learned by apprenticeship or study and practice; unskilled labor is that requiring no preparatory training. Nearly all work of both classes is included in the phrase manual labor.

A habit of labor in the people is as essential to the health and vigor of their minds and bodies as it is conducive to the welfare of the state. A. Hamilton, Works, I. 257.

3. Work done or to be done; that which requires exertion or effort; a work; a performance; an achievement: as, the twelve labors of Hercules.

By one labour, he left to posteritie three notable bookes.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 128.

Yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labours; and their works do follow them. Rev. xiv. 13.

4. The laboring class; productive work as represented by those devoted to it: as, the claims or rights of labor; the labor-market.

When labor quarrels with capital, or capital neglects the interests of labor, it is like the hand thinking it does not need the eye, the ear, or the brain.
J. F. Clarke, Self-Culture, p. 268.

5. The pangs and efforts of childbirth; parturition; travail. The first stage of labor is from the beginning to the complete dilatation of the os uteri; the second stage consists in the expulsion of the child, and the third in that of the afterbirth.

Rachel travailed, and she had hard labour.
Gen. xxxv. 16.

6 (Sp. pron. lä-bōr′). In the quicksilver-mines of California, any place where work has been or is going on; especially, in the plural, those parts of the mine from which ore is being extracted in some quantity; workings.—Commissioner of Labor. See commissioner.—Division of labor. See division.—Hard labor, in law, compulsory mechanical employment, or other work requiring continuous physical exertion, imposed on some criminals in addition to imprisonment.—Hard-labor Bill. See Blackstone's Hard-labor Bill, under bill[3].—Knights of Labor. See knight.—Labor of love. See love[1].—Premature labor, labor which takes place before the normal date of termination of pregnancy, but late enough to make possible the survival of the child. Sometimes defined as labor in the last three months of pregnancy.—Statute labor, in Scotland, the amount of work appointed by law to be furnished annually for the repair of highways. = Syn. 1. Toil, Drudgery, etc. (see work); effort, pains.

labor[1], labour (lā′bor), v. [< ME. labouren, laboren, labren, < OF. laborer, laburer, labourer, F. labourer = Pr. laborar, laorar, laurar = Sp. labrar = Pg. lavrar = It. laborare, lavorare, < L. laborare, intr. labor, strive, exert oneself, suffer, be in distress, tr. work out, elaborate, < labor, labor: see labor, n. Cf. collaborate, elaborate.] I. intrans. 1. To make a physical or mental effort to accomplish some end; exert the powers of body or mind for the attainment of some result; work; strive. The word often implies painful or strenuous effort.

Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work.
Ex. xx. 9.

Against my soul's pure truth, why labour you
To make it wander in an unknown field?
Shak., C. of E., iii. 2, 37.

How much soever I laboured to keepe them company, I could not possibly perform it. Coryat, Crudities, I. 77.

Oh, my heart
Labours a double motion to impart
So heavy tidings!
Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess, v. 3.

Ever will I labor as I can
To make my ill forebodings come to nought.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, III. 107.

2. Specifically, to exert the muscular power of the body for the attainment of some end; engage in physical or manual toil.

In sudore and swynk thou schalt thi mete tilie,
And labre for thi lyflode, for so vr lord higte.
Piers Plowman (A), vii. 219.

Thei maken the Ox to laboure 6 zeer or 7, and than thei ete him. Mandeville, Travels, p. 170.

Adam, well may we labour still to dress
This garden, still to tend plant, herb, and flower,
Our pleasant task enjoin'd. Milton, P. L., ix. 205.

3. To be burdened; be oppressed with difficulties; proceed or act with difficulty: used absolutely, or followed by under or (formerly) of.

Come unto me all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Mat. xi. 28.

The vulgar labour under a high degree of superstition.
Bacon, Fable of Pan.

If we labour of a bodily disease, we send for a physician.
Burton, Anat. of Mel., To the Reader, p. 46.

Absolute monarchy labours under the worst of all disadvantages. Brougham.

4. To suffer the pangs of childbirth; be in travail.

My Muse labours,
And thus she is deliver'd.
Shak., Othello, ii. 1, 128.

5. To move forward heavily and with difficulty; specifically, of a ship, to roll and pitch heavily in a seaway, or in such a manner as to bring a dangerous strain upon the masts, rigging, and hull.

And let the labouring bark climb hills of seas
Olympus-high, and duck again as low
As hell 's from heaven! Shak., Othello, ii. 1, 189.

To labor on the way, to go on; plod on.—To labor with, to argue or plead earnestly with: as, we labored with him for hours, but could not persuade him.—To take the laboring oar, to undertake the most toilsome or efficient part in an employment or enterprise. = Syn. 1. To struggle, plod, drudge, slave, suffer.

II. trans. 1. To cause to work; exercise.

Labour not either your mind or body presently after meales. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 252.

2. To work at; specifically, to till; cultivate. [Now rare.]

Concerning the tillage of the Island they made answere, moreouer, that no part of it was plowed or laboured.
Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 129.

Labouring the soil, and reaping plenteous crop.
Milton, P. L., xii. 18.

Diodorus Siculus states that the Celtiberians divided their land annually among individuals, to be laboured for the use of the public.
Sir J. Lubbock, Orig. of Civilisation, p. 310.

3. To produce by labor; make or work out with effort; expend labor on; strive for. [Archaic.]

The artificer and art you might command,
To labour arms for Troy. Dryden, Æneid, viii. 525.

The largest mantle her rich wardrobes hold,
Most priz'd for art, and labour'd o'er with gold.
Pope, Iliad, vi. 114.

No time will be lost to labour your return.
Walpole, Letters, II. 432.

4†. To urge; labor with.

He hath been laboured by his nearest kinsfolk and friends in Germany to have left the States, . . . but he would not.
Quoted in Motley's United Netherlands, I.

5†. To beat; belabor.

Take, shepherd, take a plant of stubborn oak,
And labour him with many a sturdy stroke.
Dryden, tr. of Virgil's Georgics, iii. 668.

labor[2] (lä-bōr′), n. [Sp., lit. labor: see labor[1], n.] A Mexican land-measure, equal to 174 acres.

A labor, in Mexican law, is composed of one million square varas, that is to say one thousand varas on each side. Hall, Mexican Law, p. 104.

laborant† (lab′ō-rant), n. [< L. laborant(t-)s, ppr. of laborare, labor, work: see labor[1], v.] One who labors; a workman; specifically, a working chemist.

Then we caused the laborant with an iron rod dexterously to stir the kindled part of the nitre.
Boyle, Works, I. 604.

★laboratory (lab′ō-rā-tō-ri), n.; pl. laboratories (-riz). [= F. laboratoire = Sp. Pg. It. laboratorio, < ML. laboratorium, a place for labor or work, < L. laborare, labor, work: see labor[1], v.] 1. A room, building, or workshop especially fitted with suitable apparatus for conducting investigations in any department of science or art, or for elaborating or manufacturing chemical, medicinal, or any similar products: as, a chemical or pharmaceutical laboratory; hence, also, figuratively, any place where or in which similar processes are carried on by natural forces.

Why does the juice which flows into the stomach contain powers which make that bowel the great laboratory, as it is by its situation the recipient, of the materials of future nutrition? Paley, Nat. Theol., vii.

The roots of many of these ancient volcanoes have been laid bare. We have been, as it were, admitted into the secrets of these subterranean laboratories of nature.
Geikie, Geol. Sketches, ii. 36.

Medical investigation was carried on actively and successfully in all the [Medical] School laboratories, four out of the fifteen subjects relating to human food.
Rep. of Pres. of Harvard College, 1887–8, p. 16.

2. Milit., an establishment for the manufacture of rockets, port-fires, fuses, percussion-caps, quick- and slow-matches, friction-primers, electric primers, etc., designed for military operations. In Great Britain laboratories are in charge of officers of the Royal Artillery; in the United States they are under the officers of the Ordnance Department.

laboratory-forge (lab′ō-rā-tō-ri-fōrj), n. A small and compact forge adapted to laboratory use, as for operations with the blowpipe.

laboratory-furnace (lab′ō-rā-tō-ri-fėr″nās), n. A small and compact form of furnace for the laboratory or workshop, such as the Bunsen-burner furnace or the blast gas-furnace.

labor-day (lā′bor-dā), n. In some of the United States, a legal holiday, commonly the first Monday in September, established for the benefit of the laboring classes.

labored, laboured (lā′bord), p. a. [< labor[1], labour, + -ed[2].] 1. Laboriously formed; made or done with laborious pains or care.

> The third Georgic seems to be the most laboured of them all; there is a wonderful vigour and spirit in the description of the horse and chariot race.
> Addison, Virgil's Georgics.

2. Bearing the marks of constrained or forced effort; not easy, natural, or spontaneous: as, a labored style of composition; a labored painting.

> The Curling Hair in tortured Ringlets flows,
> Or round the Face in labour'd Order grows.
> Gay, The Fan.

laborer, labourer (lā′bor-ėr), n. [< ME. laborer, labourer, < OF. (a) laboreor, laboreour, laboureur, F. laboureur = Sp. labrador = Pg. lavrador = It. lavoratore, < ML. laborator, a laborer, < L. laborare, labor; (b) OF. also laborier, labourier, < ML laborarius, a laborer, < L. labor, labor: see labor[1], v.] One who labors or works with body or mind, or both; specifically, one who is engaged in some toilsome physical occupation; in a more restricted sense, one who performs work which requires little skill or special training, as distinguished from a skilled workman; in the narrowest sense, such an unskilled workman engaged in labor other than that of a domestic servant, particularly in husbandry.

> And right anon he chaungede his aray,
> And cladde him as a poure labourer.
> Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 551.

> When down he came like an old o'ergrown oak,
> His huge root hewn up by the labourer's stroke.
> Drayton, David and Goliah.

> As year by year the labourer tills
> His wonted glebe, or lops the glades.
> Tennyson, In Memoriam, ci.

laboring, labouring (lā′bor-ing), n. [Verbal n. of labor[1], v.] 1. Toil; exertion; effort.

> Mr. Winthrop was chosen governour again, though some laboring had been, by some of the elders and others, to have changed. Winthrop, Hist. New England, I. 360.

2†. Tillage; cultivation.

> In labouring of lands, is hys [Virgil's] Bucoliques [figured]. Spenser, Shep. Cal., October, Glosse.

laboringly, labouringly (lā′bor-ing-li), adv. In a laboring manner; with difficulty: as, to breathe laboringly.

laborious (lā-bō′ri-us), a. [= F. laborieux = Pr. laborios = Sp. Pg. It. laborioso, < L. laboriosus (LL. also labosus), full of labor, toilsome, < labor, labor: see labor[1], n.] 1. Requiring much labor, exertion, or perseverance; toilsome; not easy: as, laborious duties; a laborious undertaking.

> With what compulsion and laborious flight
> We sunk thus low. Milton, P. L., ii. 80.

2. Using exertion; practising labor; diligent in work or service; assiduous: as, a laborious husbandman or mechanic; a laborious minister or pastor.

> Shall these amend thee, who are themselves laborious in evil doings? Milton, Hist. Eng., iii.

3. Characterized by labor or effort; marked by or manifesting labor.

> Their very abstersion and laborious excuses confess it was foul and faulty. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), p. 875.

> Laborious orient ivory sphere in sphere.
> Tennyson, Princess, Prol.

=Syn. 1. Difficult, arduous, wearisome, fatiguing, onerous. — 2. Industrious, painstaking, active, hard-working.

laboriously (lā-bō′ri-us-li), adv. In a laborious manner; with labor, toil, or difficulty.

laboriousness (lā-bō′ri-us-nes), n. 1. The quality of being laborious or attended with toil; toilsomeness; difficulty. — 2. Diligence; habitual assiduity.

> Labour or pain is commonly reckoned an ingredient of industry; and laboriousness is a name signifying it.
> Barrow, Works, III. xviii.

laborless, labourless (lā′bor-les), a. [< labor[1], n., + -less.] Not requiring arduous effort; not laborious; easily done. [Rare.]

> They intend not your precise abstinence from any light and labourless work.
> Brerewood, On the Sabbath (1630), p. 48.

labor-market (lā′bor-mär″ket), n. The supply of labor considered with reference to the demand for it.

laborous† (lā′bor-us), a. [< labor[1], n., + -ous.] An obsolete variant of laborious.

> With wery trauel, and with laborous paines, > Alwaies in trouble and in tediousness.
> Wyatt, Complaint upon Loue.

laborously† (lā′bor-us-li), adv. Laboriously.

> He [Julius Cæsar] labourously and studiously discussed controversies. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, iii. 10.

labor-pains (lā′bor-pānz), n. pl. The pains of childbirth.

labor-saving (lā′bor-sā″ving), a. Saving labor; adapted to supersede or diminish the labor of men: as, a labor-saving machine. — Labor-saving furniture, in printing. See furniture.

laborsome, laboursome (lā′bor-sum), a. [< labor[1], n., + -some.] 1†. Made with great labor and diligence.

> He hath . . . wrung from me my slow leave,
> By laboursome petition. Shak., Hamlet, i. 2, 59.

2. Apt to labor or to pitch and roll, as a ship in a heavy sea. Hamersly.

labor-time (lā′bor-tīm), n. A quantity of labor reckoned in units of time. Labor-time was regarded by Marx and his followers as the true cause and measure of the value of commodities.

> The labor-time which we take as the measure of value.
> Encyc. Brit., XXIX. 212.

labor-union (lā′bor-ū″nyon), n. A union or society of workingmen for the purpose of mutual support and encouragement. Properly, the labor-union includes all kinds of labor associations, permanent or temporary; the trade-union, only permanent associations formed on trade lines.

labor-yard (lā′bor-yärd), n. An adjunct to a charitable lodging-house, or to a workhouse, where wood-sawing or other labor is done.

labra[1]†, n. An incorrect form of labrum. Shak., M. W. of W., i. 1, 166.

labra[2], n. Plural of labrum.

Labracidæ (lā-bras′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Labrax (Labrac-) + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Labrax: by most ichthyologists regarded as a subfamily of Serranidæ. See Labracinæ.

Labracinæ (lab-rā-sī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Labrax (Labrac-) + -inæ.] A subfamily of Serranidæ, typified by the genus Labrax, having 2 dorsal fins, the first with 9 spines, and a short anal with 3 spines. It includes the common bass of Europe, the striped-bass of North America, and related species. See cut under Labrax.

labracine (lab′rā-sin), a. and n. [< Labrax (Labrac-) + -ine[1].] I. a. Pertaining to the Labracinæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A fish of the subfamily Labracinæ.

Labrador duck, falcon, etc. See duck, etc.

Labrador feldspar. Same as labradorite.

Labrador hornblende. Same as hypersthene.

labradorite (lab′ra-dôr-īt), n. [< Labrador (see def.) + -ite[2].] A lime-soda feldspar (see feldspar), one of the species intermediate between the lime feldspar, anorthite, and the soda feldspar, albite, but more closely allied to the former. It is a common constituent of igneous rocks, especially of those of the basaltic type. It is rarely found crystallized, but usually in masses, and these often show a brilliant change of colors; on this account it is sometimes used as an ornamental stone. The finest specimens come from the coast of Labrador, whence the name.

labradoritic (lab″ra-dôr-it′ik), a. [< labradorite + -ic.] Pertaining to or containing labradorite.

labral (lā′bral), a. [< labrum + -al.] In entom., of or pertaining to the labrum.

Labrax (lā′braks), n. [NL., < Gr. λάβραξ, a fish, the sea-wolf, < λάβρος, furious, fierce, greedy.] The typical genus of Labracinæ and of Labracidæ, including the labrax of the ancient Greeks, and the lupus of the ancient Romans or the sea-bass of the English, L. labrax, also called sea-dace and sea-perch. Some related fishes of the United States, as the rockfish or striped bass and the common white perch, formerly placed in this genus, are now referred to other genera. Properly called Dicentrarchus, the name Labrax having been first used for another group.

Common Bass (Dicentrarchus labrax).

labret (lā′bret), n. [< L. labrum, lip, + -et.] A piece of stone, bone, shell, or other material, inserted into the lip or into the cheek near the mouth, which is pierced for the purpose: an ornament used by many primitive tribes. Labrets have been used in northwestern America, and also in Brazil and in central Africa.

> Occasionally baked clay was employed . . . for ear plugs and labrets . . . in the same manner as were similar forms in stone and shell.
> Am. Rep. Bur. Amer. Ethnol., 1898–99, p. 43.

labretifery (lā-bre-tif′e-ri), n. [< labret + L. ferre = E. bear[1].] The practice of wearing labrets. [Rare.]

> Dr. W. H. Dall then read a paper on . . . "The Geographical Distribution of Labretifery." Science, IV. 345.

labrid (lā′brid), n. A fish of the family Labridæ. Also labridan.

Labridæ (lab′ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Labrus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Labrus. Various limits have been assigned to this family. (a) Same as Labroides of Cuvier. (b) In Günther's system of classification a family of Acanthopterygii pharyngognathi, having pseudobranchiæ, three and one half gills, and cycloid scales. Also called Cyclolabridæ. (c) In other systems, fishes of the same type as the last, excepting those without ventral fins (Siphonognathidæ) and those with teeth imbricated upon and coalesced with the jaws (Scaridæ). It includes more than 400 marine fishes, its representatives being very numerous in the tropical and warm seas. The best-known are the wrasses of England, the tautog or blackfish and cunner of the eastern United States, and the fathead of California. Also called Labroidæ, Labroidei. See cut under Labrus.

labridan (lab′ri-dan), n. Same as labrid.

labrinth†, n. A former spelling of labyrinth.

labroid (lā′broid), a. and n. [< Labrus + -oid.] I. a. Pertaining to the Labridæ or Labroidea, or having their characters.

II. n. A fish of the family Labridæ or of the superfamily Labroidea.

Labroidea (lā-broi′dē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Labrus + -oidea.] A superfamily of acanthopterygian fishes, equivalent to the Labroides of Cuvier and Labridæ of Günther, comprising the families Labridæ (c), Siphonognathidæ, and Scaridæ.

Labroides (lā-broi′dēz), n. pl. [NL., < Labrus + Gr. εἶδος, form.] In Cuvier's ichthyological system, the fourteenth family of acanthopterygian fishes, with oblong and scaly body, a single dorsal supported in front by spines (each of which is generally furnished with membranous appendages), jaws covered with fleshy lips, the lower pharyngeals united, and the intestinal canal with only two very small cæca, or none.

Labrosauridæ (lab-rō-sâ′ri-dē), n. pl. [< Labrosaurus + -idæ.] A family of carnivorous Jurassic dinosaurs, with cavernous opisthocœlous anterior vertebræ, slender pubes, of which the anterior margins are united, and elongated metatarsal bones.

Labrosaurus (lab-rō-sâ′rus), n. [NL., < Gr. λάβρος, furious, fierce, greedy, + σαῦρος, a lizard.] The typical genus of Labrosauridæ.

labrose (lā′brōs or lā-brōs′), a. [< L. labrosus, with large lips, < labrum, lip: see labrum.] Having thick lips.

labrum (lā′brum), n.; pl. labra (-brä). [L., a lip, edge, margin, akin to labium, a lip: see labium.] In zoöl., a lip or lip-like part. Specifically — (a) In entom., the so-called upper lip of an insect (the lower being the labium): a plate lying in front of the clypeus, and terminating the upper part of the head anteriorly. It generally has a vertical motion, but may be immovably attached. The labrum covers and partly conceals the organs of the mouth; it is found in most insects, but in Diptera it is partly or wholly aborted. Illiger called this organ the clypeus, applying the term labrum to a narrow posterior division of the upper lip generally known as the appendicle. See cuts under Hymenoptera and Insecta. (b) In Crustacea and Arachnida, a lobe forming the upper border of the mouth. In the spiders this lobe is very small, and the term labrum is often applied incorrectly to the labium, or large shield forming the floor of the mouth. See cut under Daphnia. (c) In conch., the outer lip of a univalve shell, the inner lip being called the labium. See cut under univalve. — Forcipate labrum. See forcipate.

Labrus (lā′brus), n. [NL. (Artedi), < L. labrus, an unidentified fish.] The type genus of Labridæ. Very different limits have been assigned to it. Many very diversiform species were referred to it, but it has been successively restricted till it is now limited to the wrasses of Europe and contiguous coasts of Africa.

Wrasse-fish (Labrus maculatus).

laburnine (lā-bėr′nin), n. [< laburn(um) + -ine[2].] A poisonous alkaloid said to accompany cytisin in the seeds of the common laburnum: later shown to be an impure nitrate ★of cytisin.

laburnum (lā-bėr'num), n. [< L. laburnum, the laburnum.] 1. A small leguminous tree, Laburnum Laburnum, a native of the Alps and neighboring mountains, much cultivated for the beauty of its pendulous racemes of yellow pea-shaped flowers. Its seeds contain two poisonous alkaloids, cytisin and laburnine. The heart-wood is dark-colored, coarse-grained, but hard and durable, and much in demand among cabinet-makers and turners, whence the names ebony of the Alps and false ebony given to it. Also called goldenchain and bean-trefoil.

And pale laburnum's pendent flowers display
Their different beauties. Dodsley, Agriculture, ii.

Laburnums, dropping-wells of fire.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, lxxxiii.

2. One of numerous other species of the same genus, or of some similar plants of other genera. The Scotch laburnum of the gardens, with larger leaves and flowers, is Laburnum alpinum. The evergreen or Nepal laburnum is Piptanthus Nepalensis. The New Zealand laburnums are varieties of Sophora tetraptera.

labyrinth (lab'i-rinth), n. [Formerly also labirinth, labrinth; = F. labyrinthe = Sp. laberinto = Pg. laberintho, labyrintho = It. labirinto, < L. labyrinthus, < Gr. λαβύρινθος: poss. < λάβρυς, the (double) ax, the symbol of the Cretan Zeus; poss. < λαύρα (λάβρα), an alley, lane: see laura.] 1. An intricate combination of passages running into one another from different directions, in which it is difficult or impossible to find the way from point to point, or to reach the place of exit from the interior, without a clue or guide; a maze. The name was anciently given to an edifice with a complicated system of passages connecting a great number of chambers. At the present day it is used especially of a geometrical arrangement of paths or alleys between high hedges in a park or garden, which lead confusedly back and forth, many of them ending in a cul-de-sac, but, when correctly followed, terminating in a central space, often occupied by a pavilion or the like. The most authentic and celebrated ancient labyrinth was that in Egypt near Arsinoë or Crocodilopolis on Lake Mœris, having 3,000 rooms in two tiers, one of which was subterranean. The Cretan labyrinth, ascribed to Dædalus, was the abode of the fabled monster Minotaur. In medieval churches the labyrinth, formed of tiles or slabs of different colors in the pavement usually of the nave, was a frequent feature. Such labyrinths were formed on a square, circular, or octagonal plan, and were sometimes of such extent that it required 2,000 steps or more to follow their course. These labyrinths were considered emblematic of Christ's progress from Jerusalem to Calvary, and were followed with certain forms of prayer by the pious on their knees, either as a penance or in lieu of a pilgrimage. A number of them survive, as in the cathedrals of Chartres and Bayeux, France; but many of the most important have been destroyed, for the reason that, having become mere objects of curiosity, they furnished occasion for disturbance of the religious services. The best-known modern labyrinths are that of the garden of Versailles in France and "the maze" of Hampton Court near London.

Labyrinth.

He cranks and crosses with a thousand doubles;
The many musets through the which he goes
Are like a labyrinth to amaze his foes.
Shak., Venus and Adonis, l. 684.

Hence—2. Any confused complication of objects, lines, ideas, etc.; any thing or subject characterized by intricate turnings or windings; a perplexity.

No thread is left else
To guide us from this labyrinth of mischief.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, ii. 3.

Whereby men wander in the darke, and in labyrinthes of errour. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 32.

The ingennous Reader, without further amusing himselfe in the labyrinth of controversall antiquity, may come the speediest way to see the truth vindicated.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst., Pref.

Though you cannot see when you take one step what will be the next, yet follow truth, justice, and plain dealing, and never fear their leading you out of the labyrinth.
Jefferson, Correspondence, I. 286.

In the elephant, the porpoise, the higher apes, and man, the cerebral surface appears a perfect labyrinth of tortuous foldings. Huxley, Man's Place in Nature, p. 114.

3. The internal ear; the essential organ of hearing. It consists of a series of communicating cavities in the petrous portion of the temporal bone, called the osseous labyrinth, and of the membranous labyrinth contained in it. The osseous labyrinth consists of the cavity known as the vestibule, the three semicircular canals, and the cochlea. The vestibule communicates with the tympanum by the fenestra ovalis, which is closed by a membrane and the foot of the stapes. The fenestra rotunda opens from the beginning of the cochlea into the tympanum. It is closed by a membrane. See ear[1], cochlea.

4. In ornith., same as tympanum, 2 (c) (1).—5. In mining, an apparatus used in concentrating or dressing slimes. It consists of a series of troughs through which the muddy water from the dressing-floors is made to flow, the particles of ore held in suspension in the water settling themselves according to size and specific gravity. This form of apparatus was formerly much more important than it now is.

6. A long chamber filled with deflectors or diaphragms placed alternately, used to cool and condense the fumes of mercury, other vapors, or smoke.—Labyrinth fret, or labyrinth ornament, in arch. See fret[3].—Membranous labyrinth, a complex membranous sac contained in the osseous labyrinth, to the walls of which it is loosely attached. It consists of the utriculus with the three semicircular canals, the ductus and saccus endolymphaticus, the sacculus, canalis reuniens, and canalis cochleæ. It contains endolymph, and is surrounded by perilymph. To it are distributed the fibers of the auditory nerve.

labyrinth (lab'i-rinth), v. t. [< labyrinth, n.] To shut up, inclose, or entangle in or as in a maze or labyrinth. [Rare.]

To entangle, trammel up, and snare
Your soul in mine, and labyrinth you there.
Keats, Lamia, ii.

labyrinthal (lab-i-rin'thal), a. [< labyrinth + -al.] Same as labyrinthian.

The labyrinthal ice mazes of the Arctic.
Arc. Cruise of the Corwin, 1881, p. 30.

labyrinthi, n. Plural of labyrinthus, 1.

labyrinthian, labyrinthean (lab-i-rin'thi-an, -thē-an), a. [< L. labyrinthēus, < Gr. λαβυρίνθειος*, pertaining to a labyrinth, < λαβύρινθος, labyrinth: see labyrinth.] Winding; intricate; perplexed. Now generally labyrinthine.

Instrument to his Labyrinthian proiects.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 25.

Mark how the labyrinthian turns they take,
The circles intricate, and mystic maze.
Young, Night Thoughts, ix. 1131.

labyrinthibranch (lab-i-rin'thi-brangk), n. One of the Labyrinthibranchii. Sir John Richardson.

labyrinthibranchiate (lab-i-rin-thi-brang'ki-āt), a. [< Gr. λαβύρινθος, labyrinth, + βράγχια, gills, + -ate[1].] Having labyrinthine gills; specifically, of or pertaining to the Labyrinthibranchii.

Labyrinthibranchii (lab-i-rin-thi-brang'ki-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λαβύρινθος, labyrinth, + βράγχια, gills.] 1. In Sir John Richardson's ichthyological system, a family of acanthopterygian fishes: same as Labyrinthici or Anabantidæ.—2. In Günther's ichthyological system, the sixteenth division of Acanthopterygii: fishes having the body compressed, oblong or elevated, scales of moderate size, and a superbranchial organ in a cavity accessory to the gill-cavity for the purpose of retaining water. It includes the Labyrinthici or Anabantidæ and the Luciocephalidæ.

labyrinthic (lab-i-rin'thik), a. [= F. labyrinthique, < L. labyrinthicus, < labyrinthus, labyrinth: see labyrinth.] 1. Like a labyrinth.—2. Specifically, in zoöl., same as labyrinthodont. Mivart, Elem. Anat., p. 275.

labyrinthical (lab-i-rin'thi-kal), a. [< labyrinthic + -al.] Same as labyrinthic.

Labyrinthici (lab-i-rin'thi-sī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. labyrinthicus: see labyrinthic.] In Günther's ichthyological system, a family of Acanthopterygii labyrinthibranchii, having dorsal or anal spines present, sometimes in great numbers. It is equivalent to the family Anabantidæ.

labyrinthiform (lab-i-rin'thi-fôrm), a. [< L. labyrinthus, labyrinth, + forma, form.] 1. Having the form of a labyrinth; intricate.—2. In ichth., having labyrinthine gills.—3. In bot., characterized by intricate and sinuous lines, as in Dædalia.

labyrinthine (lab-i-rin'thin), a. [< labyrinth + -ine[1].] Pertaining to or like a labyrinth; intricate; involved.

Labyrinthodon (lab-i-rin'thō-don), n. [NL., < Gr. λαβύρινθος, labyrinth, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] 1. The typical genus of Labyrinthodontidæ, containing certain fossil amphibians whose teeth have the dentine folded and sunk inward and are labyrinthine in structure, whence the name. Remains referred to this genus have been found in the Carboniferous, Permian, and Triassic formations, though the typical forms belong to the last.

Footprints of Labyrinthodon.

2. [l. c.] A member of the genus Labyrinthodon or order Labyrinthodontia; any labyrinthodont.

Labyrinthodon salamandroides (restored).

labyrinthodont (lab-i-rin'thō-dont), a. and n. [< Gr. λαβύρινθος, labyrinth, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] I. a. 1. Having an intricate or labyrinthic structure, as a tooth. — 2. Having teeth of labyrinthic structure; specifically, pertaining to the Labyrinthodontia, or having their characters.

One fourth of a horizontal section of a Labyrinthodont Tooth, showing labyrinthic structure. (Much magnified.)

II. n. A labyrinthodont animal; a member of the order Labyrinthodontia.

Labyrinthodonta (lab-i-rin-thō-don'tạ), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Labyrinthodon, q. v.] Same as Labyrinthodontia.

Labyrinthodontia (lab-i-rin-thō-don'shi-ạ), n. pl. [NL.: see Labyrinthodonta.] In Owen's classification, the thirteenth order of the fourth subclass of Hæmatocrya, named from the genus Labyrinthodon, containing fossil amphibians having "teeth rendered complex by undulation and side branches of the converging folds of enamel, whence the name." These animals had the head defended, as in Ganocephala, by a sculptured casque; two occipital condyles; divided dentigerous vomer; and ossified amphicœlous vertebral centra. The order has been divided into ten suborders, and is now broken up, its components being referred to several separate orders of the class Amphibia. The labyrinthodonts were large, sometimes huge, aquatic animals, some exceeding 6 feet in length, with four limbs, belonging to the same class as toads, frogs, and salamanders, of very diverse lizard-like forms, and incapable of leaping. By some modern herpetologists, as Cope, the name is restricted to a suborder, referred to the order Stegocephali, and containing the families Baphetidæ and Anthracosauridæ. Also Labyrinthodonta, Labyrinthodontes.

labyrinthodontian (lab-i-rin-thō-don'shi-an), a. [< Labyrinthodontia + -an.] Of or pertaining to the Labyrinthodontia; labyrinthodont.

labyrinthodontid (lab-i-rin-thō-don'tid), n. One of the Labyrinthodontidæ.

Labyrinthodontidæ (lab-i-rin-thō-don'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Labyrinthodon(t-) + -idæ.] A family of Labyrinthodontia, exemplified by the genus Labyrinthodon in a restricted sense.

Labyrinthula (lab-i-rin'thū-lạ), n. [NL. (Cienkowsky, 1867), dim. of L. labyrinthus: see labyrinth.] 1. The typical genus of Labyrinthulidæ, containing such species as L. vitellina, a marine form found on algæ, growing in patches visible to the naked eye.—2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

Labyrinthulidæ (lab″i-rin-thū'li-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Labyrinthula + -idæ.] A family of low filose protozoans, represented by the genus Labyrinthula, and to which the genus Chlamydomyxa is also referred. These organisms consist of irregular heaps of ovoid nucleated cells, the protoplasm of which extends itself as a branching network or labyrinth of fine threads. Also called Labyrinthulidea, and variously rated.

labyrinthus (lab-i-rin'thus), n. [NL. use of L. labyrinthus, a labyrinth: see labyrinth.] 1. Pl. labyrinthi (-thī). The labyrinth of the ear.—2. [cap.] In zoöl., a genus of helicoid mollusks.

lac[1], n. A Middle English form of lack[1].

lac[2], lakh (lak), n. [Formerly also lacque, after ★F., and lacca, as NL., sometimes lak, or lack; = F. laque = Sp. Pg. laca = It. lacca; NL. lacca = NGr. λάκη; = D. lak = G. lack = Sw. lack = Dan. lak; < Pers. lak, luk = Hind. lākh = Canarese lāk, lac, sealing-wax, < Skt. lākshā, the lac-insect, so called in ref. to the assumed number of insects in a nest, < laksha, a hundred thousand: see lac[3]. Cf. lake[2], lacker[2], lacquer.]

1. A resinous incrustation deposited on the twigs of various trees in India and southern Asia by the lac-insect, Carteria lacca. The substance is formed by the mature female, from which it exudes, inclosing the eggs and keeping them attached to the branch. At the proper time the twigs are broken off by the native collectors, and exposed to the sun to kill the insect and to dry the lac. These twigs, with the attached resin, inclosed insects, and ova, constitute the stick-lac. Lac is a dark-red transparent resin, with a crystalline fracture, and bitter in taste. It yields only a part of its coloring matter to water, but borax solution exercises a special solvent power upon it. It is still much used in the East for dyeing woolen goods and leather, producing scarlet shades, not so brilliant as cochineal, but somewhat faster. Seed-lac is obtained from stick-lac by removing the resinous concretions from the twigs and triturating with water. The greater part of the coloring matter is dissolved, and the granular portion which remains after drying is the seed-lac. Shell-lac or shellac is obtained by melting the seed-lac in cotton-cloth bags, straining, and allowing it to drop on to sticks or leaves. In this way the resin spreads into thin plates, in which state it is found in commerce. It is used in the manufacture of spirit-varnishes and sealing-wax, and as a stiffening for hats. Button-lac differs from shellac only in form. In its melted state it is dropped into disk forms three inches in diameter and one sixth of an inch thick. Lac-dye is imported from India, and is probably prepared by extracting the coloring matter from stick-lac with a weak alkali to which alumina has been added. It is used like cochineal for dyeing scarlet on woolens, but has only half as much tinctorial strength. Lac-lake is obtained by treating stick-lac with caustic soda and alum. It has a limited use as an artists' color, producing results similar to cochineal carmines, though less brilliant. The extraction of the color from the resin leaves the shellac of commerce. The general term lac is extended to the similar secretion of any lac-insect.

2†. Lacquer.

> Alum and lacque, and clouded tortoiseshell.
> Dyer, The Fleece, iv.

Coral lac, gold lac, etc. See the adjectives.—Lac varnish. Same as lacquer.—Lac water-varnish, a varnish made by dissolving pale shellac in hot water, with a little borax. It combines well as a menstruum with water-colors and inks, and forms an excellent varnish for prints. It dries transparent and impervious to moisture.

lac³, lakh (lak), n. [Also written lack; < Hind. lak, also lākh, lakh, < Skt. laksha, a hundred thousand, a mark, token.] The sum of 100,000, usually of rupees. The usual pointing for sums of Indian money rising above a lac is with a comma after the number of lacs: thus, Rs. 30,52,000 (i. e. thirty lacs and fifty-two thousand) or Rs. 49,98,810, instead of the equivalent 3,052,000 and 4,998,810 rupees.

lac argenti (lak är-gen'tī). [L., milk of silver: lac, milk; argenti, gen. of argentum, silver.] In alchemy, freshly precipitated silver chlorid.

laccat, n. [NL.] Same as *lac*². Hakluyt.

laccate (lak'āt), a. [As if from NL. laccatus*, ★< lacca, lac: see *lac*².] In bot., appearing as if varnished; covered with a coat resembling sealing-wax.

lacchet, v. and n. A Middle English form of ★*latch*¹.

laccic (lak'sik), a. [< *lac*² (NL. lacca) + -ic.] Pertaining to lac, or produced from it. [Rare.]

laccine (lak'sin), n. [< *lac*² (NL. lacca) + *-ine*².] A peculiar substance obtainable from lac, insoluble in water, alcohol, or ether.

laccinic (lak-sin'ik), a. [< laccine + -ic.] Related to or derived from lac. Also laccainic.—Laccinic acid, a crystallizable dibasic acid which is essentially the coloring matter of lac-dye and closely resembles carminic acid in its reactions.

laccolith (lak'ō-lith), n. [< Gr. λάκκος, a pit (with ref. to crater) (see *lake*¹), + λίθος, stone.] A name given by G. K. Gilbert to masses of lava which, when rising from below, have not found their way to the surface, but have spread out laterally, and formed a lenticular aggregation, thereby lifting the rocks above into dome-shaped forms.

laccolithic (lak-ō-lith'ik), a. [< laccolith + -ic.] Pertaining to, or resembling in form, a laccolith.

Laccopteris (la-kop'te-ris), n. [NL., < Gr. λάκκος, a pit, + πτερίς, a fern, < πτερόν = E. feather.] A genus of fossil ferns established by Presl in 1838, and occurring through the whole range of the Jurassic in Europe. It is distinguished by its digitately pinnate frond, ovate or linear-lanceolate pinnules, well-marked median nerve, and dichotomous secondary nervation. It is closely related to Selenocarpus, but in that genus the sori are semilunar in form, while in Laccopteris they are circular, with a depressed center. The digitate frond of Laccopteris resembles that of the genus Matonia, and its mode of fructification is similar to that of Dicranopteris.

lac-dye (lak'dī), n. See *lac*², 1.

lace (lās), n. [< ME. las, laas, < OF. las, laz, ★laqs, F. lacs = Pr. lac, laz, latz = Sp. lazo = Pg. laço = It. laccio, noose, snare, string, < L. laqueus, noose, snare; perhaps < lacere, allure: see allect, elicit, illect. From the L. laqueus are also ult. E. latchet and lasso.] 1†. A noose; snare; net.

> Lo, alle thise folk icaught were in hire [Venus's] las,
> Til they for wo ful often sayde allas!
> Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1093.

2. A cord or string used in binding or fastening; specifically, a cord or string used for drawing together opposite edges, as of a corset, a bodice, a shoe, or the like, by being passed out and in through holes and fastened.

> For, striving more, the more in laces strong > Himselfe he tide. Spenser, Muiopotmos, l. 427.
>
> O cut my lace in sunder, that my pent heart
> May have some scope to beat.
> Shak., Rich. III., iv. 1, 34.

3. Hence, any ornamental cord or braid used as an edging or trimming, especially when made of gold or silver thread. See gold lace, below.—4. A fabric of fine threads of linen, silk, or cotton, whether twisted or plaited together or worked like embroidery, or made by a combination of these processes, or (as at the present time) by machinery. Pillow- or bobbin-lace is made, by a process intermediate between weaving and plaiting, from a number of threads which are kept in their places by the weight of the bobbins attached to them, and are woven and plaited together by hand. Needle-point lace is really embroidery, but is done upon loose threads which the worker has laid upon a drawn pattern, and which have no connection with each other and no stability until the needlework holds them together. (See bobbin-lace, needle-point lace, below.) Lace is known, according to kind, by many different names. See phrases below.

> No! let a charming chintz and Brussels lace > Wrap my cold limbs, and shade my lifeless face.
> Pope, Moral Essays, i. 248.

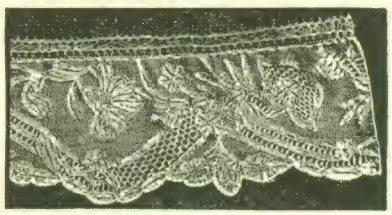
5†. Spirits added to coffee or other beverage.



> He is forced every morning to drink his dish of coffee by itself, without the addition of the Spectator, that used to be better than lace to it. Spectator, No. 488.

6†. A stringer; beam. Halliwell.—Albisola lace, bobbin-lace made at Albisola, near Savona, in Italy, usually in free designs of scrollwork.—Alençon lace, a needle-point lace named from the city of Alençon in France. It is the only important French lace, except the Argentan, which is not made with bobbins. The fine lace of the eighteenth century was made entirely in small pieces, which were sewed together afterward by a stitch called assemblage, and not by that known as point de raccroc, the seam following the outlines of the pattern for the sake of concealment. This lace sometimes has horse-hairs worked in along the edge to give firmness to the cordonnet: this was made necessary by the use of it for the towering headdresses of the eighteenth century.

Alençon Lace (Point d'Alençon).

Alençon lace is usually considered as indistinguishable from Argentan; but it has more commonly a needle-made réseau or net. See Argentan lace.—Antwerp lace, a bobbin-lace resembling early Alençon, having a so-called pot introduced into the design—that is, a semblance of a vase or basket constantly repeated. See pot-lace, below.—Application-lace, a lace made by sewing flowers or sprigs, which may be needle-made or bobbin-made, upon a bobbin-lace ground; especially, a Brussels lace of this kind, the most commonly made and the most important of all the Brussels laces.—Appliqué lace. Same as application-lace.—Argentan lace, a needle-point lace usually considered as indistinguishable from Alençon lace, but often bolder and larger in pattern, with the solid parts or toilé flatter and more compact. It is also distinguished in some cases by a ground of hexagonally arranged brides.—Arras lace, a white bobbin-lace made at Arras in France, very strong, and inexpensive because of the simplicity of the pattern. The ground is that known as Lisle ground.—Aurillac lace, a bobbin-lace made at Aurillac, department of Cantal, France. It was originally a close-woven solid lace, having much toilé, and resembling the guipure of Genoa and Flanders; later it resembled point d'Angleterre.—Auvergne lace, lace made in Auvergne. It is most commonly pure bobbin-lace, but of many different makes and patterns, as nearly all celebrated laces are imitated in this region.—Ave Maria lace, narrow lace used for edging. See Dieppe lace.—Baby lace, a narrow lace used for edging, especially that made in Buckinghamshire and Bedfordshire, England, in very simple patterns.—Basket-lace†, a lace mentioned in inventories of 1580, probably a braid or lacing so woven or plaited as to resemble basketwork.—Bayeux lace. (a) A modern bobbin-lace made at Bayeux in Normandy, especially that made in close imitation of rose-point. (b) A black-silk lace, in demand because made in unusually large pieces, as for shawls, fichus, etc.—Beaded lace. See beaded.—Beggar's lace†. Same as gueuse lace. Mrs. Bury Palliser. [Eng.]—Biliment lace†. See biliment.—Bisette lace, a French peasant-lace made in narrow pieces, coarse and simple in design. The name has now become identified with narrow bordering-lace of small value.—Bobbin-lace, lace of which the threads are twisted or plaited together, without the use of the needle. (See def. 3.) When the whole width of a large piece of lace is carried on together, the number of bobbins and of pins is very great and the work very expensive; but it is customary to work each branch or scroll separately, these being then tacked together on the ground by crocheting.—Bobbin-net lace, a kind of application-lace in which the pattern is applied upon a ground of bobbin-net or tulle.—Bone point-lace, lace that has no regular ground of meshes. The name is of no definite significance, and has no connection with bone-lace.—Border lace, lace of any sort made in long narrow pieces having a footing on one side, the other edge being usually vandyked, purled, or the like.—Bourg-Argental lace, a blond-lace made in the latter part of the eighteenth century in Dauphiny, and considered of exceptional beauty, the silk used being especially fitted for the purpose.—Bride-lace, lace of which the ground is wholly composed of brides or bars, without a réseau or net.—Broad lace. See broad.—Brussels lace, lace made at and near Brussels in Belgium; especially, a lace of great fineness, of which the pattern has less relief than Alençon, and the very fine net ground never has picots. At the present time Brussels lace is especially an application-lace, having needle-point sprigs and flowers sewed to a bobbin-ground, or in some cases bobbin-made or plat flowers applied to a needle-made ground or to tulle. In trade the name is often given to fine laces, no matter where made or of what pattern. Compare point de gaze.—Buckingham lace, a lace made originally in England, and of two kinds: (a) Buckingham trolly (which see, under trolly), and (b) a lace having a point ground, which is peculiar in having the pattern outlined with thicker threads, these threads being weighted by bobbins larger and heavier than the rest.—Cadiz lace, a kind of needle-point lace, considered as a variety of Brussels lace.—Carnival lace. See carnival.—Cartisane lace, guipure or passement made with cartisane, which is parchment or vellum in thin strips or small rolls, covered with silk, gold thread, or the like. See guipure.—Caterpillar point-lace. See caterpillar.—Chain-lace, a braid or passement so worked as to suggest links of a chain, used in the seventeenth century. It was made of colored silk, and also of gold and silver thread.—Chantilly lace, a kind of blond-lace of which the typical sort has a ground of Alençon réseau or net and the flowers in openwork instead of solid or mat. It is made of one kind of silk throughout, which is always grenadine or non-lustrous silk, so that black lace of this kind is often taken for thread-lace. Much Chantilly lace is made in the department of Calvados in France.—Chenille lace. See chenille.—Cluny lace, a kind of net-lace in which the stitch is darned upon a square-net background. The patterns used are generally antique and quaint, conventionalized birds, animals, and flowers; and the modern work of the kind is quite similar to that of the seventeenth century. A glazed thread is sometimes introduced in the pattern as an outline or center line.—Cordover lace a kind of filling used in the pattern of ancient and modern point-lace.—Cork lace, Irish lace in general, especially of the older sorts, made principally in the city of Cork before the recent extension of this industry in Ireland.—Cretan lace. See Cretan.—Crewel lace. See *crewel*¹.—Crochet lace, lace made with the crochet-hook, or of which the pattern is made in this way but applied to a bobbin- or machine-made net. It resembles needle-point, although not equaling its finest kinds.—Crown lace, early lace, guipure, cut-work, and the like, in which royal crowns are introduced as part of the pattern. It appears first in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.—Dalecarlian lace. See Dalecarlian.—Damascene lace. See damascene.—Darned lace, a name given to lace of any kind which has a netted ground upon which the pattern is applied in needlework. Also called filet guipure. See def. 3, *ground*¹, n., 10 (f), guipure, and spider-work.—Devonshire lace, lace made in Devonshire, England, especially that made in close imitation of Honiton.—Diamond lace†, passement and gimp often mentioned in texts of the seventeenth century, apparently a silver or gold passement having lozenges for the chief element in the design.—Dieppe lace, a fine point-lace resembling Valenciennes, made at Dieppe in France. In the eighteenth century there were several varieties of Dieppe lace, bearing the popular names of Ave Maria lace and dentelle à la Vierge, the latter of which had a regular ground of squares composed of small meshes alternating with open squares, upon which ground the pattern, usually very simple, was applied in close-stitch or close-work.—Dresden point-lace. Same as Saxony lace.—Duchesse lace, a variety of pillow-lace, originally made in Belgium, and containing a great deal of the raised work, volants, and the like, which are used in the somewhat similar Honiton lace.—Dunkirk lace, a pillow-lace made in the seventeenth century, of which the more important kind was a close imitation of Mechlin, and was perhaps sold as such.—Dutch lace. See Dutch.—Écru lace. See écru.—English point-lace. (a†) A bobbin-lace very much admired in the eighteenth century, often mentioned in French documents of the time under the name of point d'Angleterre. It is generally said to have been of Flemish make, and to have been called "English" by English dealers in order to evade the law. Some writers, however, affirm its English origin. (b) At the present day, the finest Brussels lace, where needle-point sprigs are applied to Brussels bobbin-ground. See application-lace, above.—False Valenciennes lace. (a) Lace resembling Valenciennes, but without the true Valenciennes réseau. The surface and general character of the pattern closely resemble those of the true Valenciennes. (b) A general name for Valenciennes made in Belgium.—Flat point-lace, point-lace which has no raised work or embroidery in relief upon it.—Flemish point-lace, needle-point lace made in Flanders, especially the delicate sprigs used in Brussels lace.—Fuseau lace. [F. fuseau, a bobbin.] Same as bobbin-lace.—Genoa lace, originally, gold and silver lace, for which Genoa was celebrated in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries; at the present time, especially, lace made from vegetable fibers such as the aloe, and also macramé lace.—Gold lace, a kind of network, braid, or gimp, made anciently of gold or silver-gilt wire, and in modern times of silk, thread, or cord covered by thin flat ribbons of gold wound around it. Gold lace is used chiefly as a decoration for uniforms, liveries, and some church costumes.—Grammont lace, one of two kinds of lace, usually inexpensive and used for shawls and the like: (a) A white pillow-lace, originally made at Grammont in Belgium. (b) A black-silk lace like blond-lace.—Gueuse lace, a thread pillow-lace made in France during the seventeenth century. Also called beggar's lace.—Henriquez lace, a fine stitch or point, used alike in old and in modern needle-point work.—Hollie-point lace. See hollie-point.—Honiton lace, a lace made at Honiton in Devonshire, England, remarkable for the beauty of its figures and sprigs. Honiton application is a lace made by working sprays, flowers, and other parts of a pattern on the lace-pillow and securing them to a net ground made separately. In modern manufacture, hand-made sprays are often sewed upon a machine-made ground. Honiton guipure is a lace of large flower-patterns, with a very open ground, which is generally sold under the name of Honiton lace.—Imitation lace, machine-made lace of any kind. In fineness the imitation often rivals real lace; its chief defect is its mechanical regularity of pattern, which makes the design lifeless and uninteresting.—Jesuit lace, a modern needle-point lace made in Ireland: so called from a tradition concerning the introduction of this manufacture since the famine of 1846.—Knotted lace. See knotted.—Lille lace, lace made at Lille in France, remarkable for its clear and light ground, which is known as fond clair, and is the most beautiful of the single-thread grounds, sometimes ornamented with points d'esprit. Old Lille lace has a peculiarly stiff and formal pattern.—Limerick lace, a kind of needlework upon machine-made net, worked in a tambour-frame.—Macklin lace†. Same as Mechlin lace.—Mechlin lace, a bobbin-lace which has the pattern outlined by a flat cord or band, narrow but very distinct. It is usually made in one piece, pattern and ground together. The ground is sometimes a réseau, or net, and when of this character is very varied in pattern, and sometimes formed of brides.—Mignonette lace, a light bobbin-lace with an open ground resembling tulle, made in narrow strips. Arras and Lille were famous for this in the eighteenth century. Also called menuet lace.—Mirecourt lace lace made in the departments of Vosges and Meurthe-et-Moselle, France. (a) In the seventeenth century, a guipure, more delicate in texture and varied in design than other guipures. (b) At the present day, an application-lace, made of sprigs of bobbin-lace sewed upon grounds often made elsewhere, especially of the Alençon réseau.—Needle-point lace, lace made wholly with the needle. A pattern is first drawn, usually upon parchment; to this parchment is stitched a double piece of linen, and threads are then laid along the main lines of the pattern and sewed lightly down. Then the whole design is carried out, both solid filling and openwork, with delicate stitching, chiefly in the buttonhole-stitch.—Oyah lace, a sort of guipure lace or openwork embroidery made by means of a hook in a fashion similar to crochet. The pattern is often elaborate and in silks of many colors, representing flowers, foliage, etc. It is sometimes in relief.—Parchment-lace, lace in the manufacture of which parchment has been used, whether for the pattern used to guide the worker, as in needle-point lace, or for stiffening the fabric, as in cartisane lace. See point de velin, under point.—Pillow-lace, lace made on a cushion, both pattern and mesh being formed by hand.—Plaited lace, a kind of pillow-lace of simple geometrical design, often made of stout and rigid strands, such as gold thread or even fine braid.—Point-lace. Same as needle-point lace. Many laces and grounds of lace are spoken of as point, but are not necessarily point-lace. See point.—Pot-lace, lace into the pattern of which a sort of vase or deep dish is introduced, or sometimes rather a basket, often having flowers in it. Compare pot-plate.—Powdered lace. (a) Lace of which the ground is strewn with small separate ornaments, whether flowers, or simple sprigs, or mere squares like points d'esprit. (b) Lace which has been whitened. See powder, v. t.—Saxony lace, fine-drawn work embroidered with the needle, greatly in favor in the eighteenth century; in modern times, lace of many kinds made in Saxony, especially an imitation of old Brussels.—Seaming-lace, a narrow openwork braiding, gimp, or insertion, with parallel sides, used for uniting two breadths of linen, instead of sewing them directly the one to the other: a device employed for curtains, cupboard-cloths, etc., and even for some garments, especially in the seventeenth century. The name is applied to a similar fabric when used in other ways, as for edgings.—Silver lace, passement or guipure a large part or the whole of which is in silver wire, or thread wound with a thin flat ribbon of silver. Compare gold lace.—Spanish lace. (a) Needle-point lace brought from Spanish convents since their dissolution, but thought by some authorities to be of Flemish origin. (b) Cut and drawn work made in convents in Spain, of patterns usually confined to simple sprigs and flowers. (c) A modern black-silk lace with large flower-patterns, mostly of Flemish make. (d) A modern needle-made fabric, the pattern usually in large squares.—Statute lace†, a fabric named in inventories of 1581, apparently gimp or passement made in conformity with sumptuary laws as to width and material.—Tambour-lace, a modern kind of lace made with needle-embroidery on machine-made net. It has been made especially in Ireland, and is generally included among Limerick laces.—Tape lace, a lace made with the needle except that a tape or narrow piece of linen is incorporated in the work and forms the chief patterns, the edges of it being often rolled up and stitched so as to form a sort of cordonnet. It is in imitation of the reliefs of rose-point.—Thread lace, lace made of linen thread, as distinguished from silk laces, such as blond, and modern cotton lace.—Torchon lace, coarse bobbin-lace, made of stout and rather soft and loosely twisted thread. Most peasant-lace is of this sort, and an imitation of it is largely made by machinery.—Trolly lace. See trolly.—Valenciennes lace, a very durable bobbin-lace having the same kind of thread throughout for both ground and pattern. The pattern and ground are made together by the same hand; and as this involves the use of a great number of threads and bobbins, the price is very high. It is the dearest of all bobbin-laces. During the French revolution the manufacture was almost wholly removed to Belgium, where it still remains.—Ypres lace, a bobbin-lace resembling Valenciennes, sometimes having bolder designs and a rather large lozenge mesh in the ground. (See also blond-lace, bone-lace.)

Argentan Lace.

Mechlin Lace.

lace (lās), v.; pret. and pp. laced, ppr. lacing. [< ME. lacen, < OF. lacer, F. lacer = Pr. lassar, lachar = Sp. lazar = Pg. laçar = It. lacciare, < L. lacere, entice, allure: see lace, n.] I. trans. 1†. To catch, as in a net or gin; entrap; insnare.

I saw the King, now out of mourning, in a suit laced with gold and silver. Pepys, Diary, I. 278.

4. To cover with intersecting streaks; streak.

Here lay Duncan,
His silver skin laced with his golden blood.
Shak., Macbeth, ii. 3. 118.

5. To mark with the lash; beat; lash. [Colloq.]

I looked into a certain corner near, half expecting to see the slim outline of a once-dreaded switch, which used to lurk there waiting to leap out imp-like and lace my quivering palm or shrinking neck.
Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxi.

6†. To intermix, as coffee or other beverage, with spirits: as, a cup of coffee laced with a drop of brandy.

Prithee, Captain, let's go drink a Dish of lac'd Coffee, and talk of the Times. Wycherley, Plain Dealer, iii. 1.

7. To interlace; intertwine.

The caller and payer of the forfeit standing up, and joining their hands with the fingers laced.
Macmillan's Mag., Jan., 1868, p. 248.

Laced mutton. See mutton.—Laced plumage, in poultry, etc. See lacing, 8.—To lace one's coat, to beat one. [Slang.]

I'll lace your coat for ye. Sir R. L'Estrange.

II. intrans. 1. To be fastened or tied by a lace; have a lace: as, shoes or a bandage made to lace in front.—2. To practise tight lacing. [Colloq.]

lacebark (lās'bärk), n. 1. A small tree of the West Indies, the Lagetta lintearia, of the family Daphnaceæ, so called from the texture of its inner bark, which consists of numerous concentric layers of fibers interlacing in all directions. It is made into sleeves, purses, etc.—2. In New South Wales, Pœcilodermis acerifolia, the flame-tree.—3. In New Zealand, a malvaceous tree, Plagianthus betulinus.

lace-boot (lās'böt), n. A boot which is fastened by a lace.

laceborder (lās'bôr″dėr), n. A geometrid moth, Acidalia ornata, of small size and silvery-white color, with a broad border like lace to the wings, common on chalky soils in England: an English collectors' name.

lace-coral (lās'kor″al), n. A fossil bryozoan of the family Fenestellidæ.

Lacedæmonian (las″e-dē-mō'ni-an), a. and n. [< L. Lacedæmonius, < Gr. Λακεδαιμόνιος, of Lacedæmon, < Λακεδαίμων, > L. Lacedæmon, Lacedæmo, Lacedæmon, Sparta, Laconia. Cf. Laconian.] I. a. Pertaining to the city of Lacedæmon or Sparta in Greece, or to the country of Lacedæmon or Laconia; Spartan; Laconian.

II. n. A native of Lacedæmon; a Spartan or Laconian.

lace-embossing (lās'em-bos″ing), n. The ornamentation or pattern of needle-point lace worked in relief.

lace-fern (lās'fėrn), n. 1. A small elegant fern, Cheilanthes gracillima, in which the under side of the bipinnate frond is densely covered with matted wool. It is found in western North America.—2. Any of the several species of the genus Hymenophyllum.

lace-fly (lās'flī), n. Any neuropteroid insect; a member of the old order Neuroptera.

lace-frame (lās'frām), n. Any one of a variety of machines used in the manufacture of lace. The construction of these machines is ingenious and complicated in the extreme. They are also called by other names, as bobbin-net machine, point-net frame, and warp-net frame. The older stocking-frame is the parent of these machines, and also of the numerous kinds of knitting-machine now in use.

laceleaf (lās'lēf), n. Same as latticeleaf.

lace-leather (lās'leтн″ėr), n. Leather used for laces and thongs.

lace-lizard (lās'liz″ärd), n. An Australian lizard, Hydrosaurus giganteus.

laceman (lās'man), n.; pl. lacemen (-men). A man who deals in lace.

I met with a Nonjuror, engaged very warmly with a laceman who was the great support of a neighbouring conventicle. Addison, Coffee House Politicians.

lace-mender (lās'men″dėr), n. One who mends or repairs lace; specifically, in lace-making, one who restores damaged meshes in machine-made net.

All the Brussels ladies have old lace—very precious—which must be mended all the times it is washed; . . . but . . . those who know I have been a lace-mender will despise me. Charlotte Brontë, The Professor, xvii.

lace-paper (lās'pā″pėr), n. Paper stamped or cut by hand with an openwork pattern resembling some variety of lace.

lace-piece (lās'pēs) n. In ship-building, same as lacing, 6.

lace-pillow (lās'pil″ō), n. A round or oval board with a stuffed covering, held on the knees to support the fabric in the process of making pillow-lace.

lacerable (las'ę-ra-bl), a. [= F. lacérable, < LL. lacerabilis, that can be lacerated, < L. lacerare, lacerate: see lacerate.] Capable of being lacerated or torn; liable to laceration.

Since the lungs are obliged to a perpetual commerce with the air, they must necessarily lie open to great damages, because of their thin and lacerable composure. Harvey, Consumptions.

lacerant (las'ę-rant), a. [< L. laceran(t-)s, ppr. of lacerare, lacerate: see lacerate.] Of a lacerating character; tearing; harrowing. [Rare.]

The bell on the orthodox church called the members of Mr. Peck's society together for the business meeting with the same plangent, lacerant note that summoned them to worship on Sundays. Howells, Annie Kilburn, xxv.

lacerate (las'ę-rāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. lacerated, ppr. lacerating. [< L. laceratus, pp. of lacerare (> It. lacerare = Sp. Pg. lacerar = F. lacérer), tear to pieces, mangle, lacerate, < lacer, torn, mangled, = Gr. λακερός, torn; cf. Skt. √ vraçch, vrak*, hew, cut, tear, > varka = E. wolf: see wolf.] 1. To tear roughly; mangle in rending or violently tearing apart: as, to lacerate the flesh; a lacerated wound.

Sprain or strain, in which the ligamentous and tendinous structures around the joint are stretched and even lacerated. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 682.

2. Figuratively, to torture; harrow: as, to lacerate one's feelings.

This second weaning, needless as it is,
How does it lac'rate both your heart and his!
Cowper, Tirocinium, l. 558.

lacerate (las'ę-rāt), a. [= F. laceré, < L. laceratus, pp.: see the verb.] Rent; torn: specifically applied (from natural appearance) in botany (also lacerated) to a leaf having the edge variously cut into irregular segments, and in anatomy to three foramina at the base of the cranium. See below.—Anterior lacerate foramen. Same as foramen lacerum anterius (which see, under foramen).—Middle lacerate foramen. Same as foramen lacerum medium (which see, under foramen).—Posterior lacerate foramen. Same as foramen lacerum posterius (which see, under foramen).

lacerately (las'ę-rāt-li), adv. With laceration.

★laceration (las-ę-rā′shọn), n. [= F. lacération = Sp. laceración = Pg. laceração = It. lacerazione, < L. laceratio(n-), a tearing, mangling, < lacerare, tear, mangle: see lacerate.] 1. The act of lacerating or tearing or rending.—2. A rough or jagged breach made by rending.—3. A wounding or harrowing, as of the feelings or sensibility.

lacerative (las′ę-rā-tiv), a. [< It. lacerativo; as lacerate + -ive.] Tearing; having the power to lacerate or tear.

> Some depend upon the intemperament of the part ulcerated, others upon the continual afflux of lacerative humours. Harvey, Consumptions.

lacert†, n. [< ME. lacerte, < L. lacertus, the muscular part of the arm from the shoulder to the elbow (likened to a lizard, from its tapering to the tendon), the arm, muscle, < lacerta, lacertus, a lizard: see lizard. Cf. muscle, as ult. connected with mouse.] A muscle.

> Every lacerte in his brest adoun
> Is schent with venym and corrupcioun.
> Chaucer, Knight's Tale, l. 1895

Lacerta (lā-sėr′tą), n. [L.; also lacertus, a lizard: cf. lizard and alligator, ult. < L. lacerta, lacertus, lizard.] 1. In zoöl., a genus of lizards, typical of the family Lacertidæ. The name has been used in senses almost as broad as those of Lacertæ or Lacertilia. As now restricted, it covers a large number of common harmless lizards of the Old World, and chiefly of its warmer parts, of active diurnal habits, living on the ground chiefly, with four well-developed limbs and movable eyelids. They are of slender form, with long slim tail and non-imbricated scales. L. agilis is the common gray lizard or sand-lizard of England. L. viridis is the green lizard of southern Europe.

2. A small constellation which first appears in the "Prodromus Astronomiæ" of Hevelius, published in 1690. It is bounded by Cepheus, Cygnus, Pegasus, and Andromeda. Its brightest star is of the fourth magnitude.—3†. [l. c.] A fathom. Doomsday Book.

Lacertæ (lā-sėr′tē), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Lacerta.] An order of reptiles, the Lacertilia. It corresponds to the order Sauria exclusive of the crocodiles. Wagler, 1830; R. Owen.

lacertian (lā-sėr′shi-ąn), a. and n. [< L. lacerta, a lizard, + -ian.] I. a. Lizard-like; lacertilian; of or pertaining to the Lacertæ or Lacertilia; saurian, in a narrow sense.

II. n. A lacertilian; a lizard.

lacertid (lā-sėr′tid), n. A lizard of the restricted family Lacertidæ.

Lacertidæ (lā-sėr′ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lacerta + -idæ.] The typical lizards, a family of true eriglossate lacertilians, exemplified by the genus Lacerta, belonging to the superfamily Lacertoidea and order Lacertilia. They have clavicles not dilated proximally, parietal bones confluent, supratemporal fossæ roofed over, premaxillary single, and no osteodermal plates. The Lacertidæ are confined to the Old World, and are found chiefly in the warmer parts of Europe and Asia. They have a slender scaly body, with a long, fragile, tapering tail, well-developed limbs with 4 or 5 toes bearing claws, bright eyes with movable lids, slender forked protrusile tongue, and often brilliant or varied colors. The family includes, within the limits thus given, about 100 species belonging to 17 genera, most abundantly represented in Africa and by a few forms in India. None occur in America. Lacerta agilis and L. (Zoötoca) vivipara are the British representatives of the family.

lacertiform (lā-sėr′ti-fôrm), a. [< L. lacerta, lacertus, a lizard, + forma, form.] Having the form of a lizard; lacertilian in structure.

Lacertilia (las-ėr-til′i-ą), n. pl. [NL., < L. lacerta, lacertus, a lizard: see Lacerta.] An order of reptiles, including the saurians proper or lizards, as the monitors, iguanas, geckos, chameleons, etc., and excluding the crocodiles. The order thus agrees with the old order Sauria divested of its non-conformable types. The Lacertilia have a scaly body mostly elongate, and usually 4 well-developed limbs, which, however, may be reduced to 2, or apparently to none, in which case there may be rudiments of a shoulder-girdle or hip-girdle. The vertebræ are biconcave in the Gecconoidea and Uroplatoidea, but generally procœlous, and have but one facet on each side for the articulation of the ribs, which are usually few in number, some of them being always attached to the sternum. The heart is tripartite, with two auricles and one ventricle. The anal cleft is transverse. The mouth is not dilatable, as it usually is in Ophidia or serpents, and the usually simple teeth are generally acrodont or pleurodont, not fixed in distinct sockets. The eyes are normally furnished with two or three movable lids. The animals are oviparous or ovoviviparous, mostly diurnal in habits, and agile in movement; they average but a few inches in length, with some signal exceptions, as among the monitors or varanoids and the iguanas. Only the Helodermatidæ are known to be poisonous. The Lacertilia have been variously subdivided. An old division is into 3 suborders, Fissilinguia, Brevilinguia, and Vermilinguia, according to the characters of the tongue. Another mode of classification was into 8 suborders, Cyclosaura, Fissilinguia, Strobilosaura, Nyctisaura, Dendrosaura, Rhynchocephala, Amphisbænoidea, and Geissosaura. In a recent classification, after throwing out Sphenodon or Hatteria, as the type of a separate order Rhynchocephalia, the Lacertilia are divided into two groups—(1) the Lacertilia vera or Eriglossa containing all the Lacertilia except (2) the Rhiptoglossa, a division comprising the chameleons alone, also called Dendrosaura or Vermilinguia. The Lacertilia vera consist of 20 families, representing 10 superfamilies. Gecconoidea, Eublepharoidea, Uroplatoidea, Pygopodoidea, Agamoidea, Aniellioidea, Helodermatoidea, Varanoidea, Lacertoidea, Anelytropoidea.

lacertilian (las-ėr-til′i-ąn), a. and n. [< Lacertilia + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Lacertilia, or having their characters; lacertiform; saurian.

II. n. One of the Lacertilia; a saurian.

lacertilioid (las-ėr-til′i-oid), a. [< Lacertilia + -oid.] Lizard-like; lacertiform; resembling a lacertilian.

Lacertina (las-ėr-tī′nä), n. pl. [NL., < Lacerta + *-ina*2.] A small group of the order Lacertilia, including the most ordinary lizards, closely related to the Scincoidea and Chalcidea.

lacertine (lā-sėr′tin), a. [< L. lacerta, lizard, + *-ine*1.] Same as lacertian or lacertilioid.—Lacertine work, ornament consisting in part of intertwined lizards or serpents. It is used in ancient Celtic manuscript decoration, and occurs in Romanesque illumination and later, as well as in metal-work and carving.

Lacertine Work, from a French manuscript of the 13th century.

Lacertinidæ (las-ėr-tin′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lacerta + -inus + -idæ.] Same as Lacertidæ. J. E. Gray, 1825.

lacertoid (lā-sėr′toid), a. Lizard-like; specifically, pertaining to the Lacertoidea, or having their characters.

Lacertoidea (las-ėr-toi′dē-ą), n. pl. [NL., < Lacerta + -oidea.] A superfamily of eriglossate lacertilians, having concavo-convex vertebræ, clavicles undilated proximally, and developed postorbital and postfronto-squamosal arches. The group embraces five families of ordinary lizards, the Xantusiidæ, Ameividæ (or Teiidæ), Lacertidæ, Gerrhosauridæ, and Scincidæ. T. Gill, Smithsonian Report, 1885, p. 800.

lace-runner (lās′run″ėr), n. A person who runs with the needle the design imprinted upon machine-made net. This operation is called lace-running.

lace-tree (lās′trē), n. Same as lacebark.

lace-winged (lās′wingd), a. Having gauzy wings veined or netted like lace.—Lace-winged fly, a neuropterous insect of the family Chrysopidæ, and especially of the genus Chrysopa, whose larvæ are called aphis-lions from their habit of preying upon plant-lice. The eggs are laid in groups, each at the end of a long footstalk. The larvæ are entirely carnivorous, sucking the juices of plant-lice through their long jaws. They transform to pupæ within dense whitish globular cocoons, from which the imago escapes through a circular hole cut by the pupa. See cut under Chrysopa.

lace-woman (lās′wùm″ąn), n. A woman who deals in laces.

> Let in
> No lace-woman . . . that brings French masks,
> And cut-works. B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass, ii. 1.

lache2† (lach), n. A Middle English form of *latch*3.

lache3†, a. An obsolete form of *lash*2.

laches1 (lach′ez), n. [< ME. lachesse, lacchesse, < OF. lachesse, laxness, remissness, < lache, lax, remiss: see *lache*2, *lash*2.] 1. Negligence; remissness; inexcusable delay; neglect to do a thing at the proper time.

> Than cometh Lachesse, that is he that whan he begynneth any good work, anon he wol forlete it and stinte. Chaucer, Parson's Tale.

> In his heart he [Mr. Farebrother] felt rather ashamed that his conduct had shown laches which others who did not get benefices were free from. George Eliot, Middlemarch, lii.

2. In law, remissness in asserting or enforcing a right, or neglect prejudicing some right of the person chargeable with it.

> The law also determines that in the king can be no negligence, or laches, and therefore no delay will bar his right. Blackstone, Com., I. vii.

Laches of entry, a neglect of the heir to enter.

Laches2 (lā′kēz), n. [NL. (Thorell, 1869).] A genus of spiders: same as Lachesis, a name preoccupied in herpetology.

Lachesis (lak′e-sis), n. [L., < Gr. λάχεσις, lit. lot, destiny, < λαγχάνειν, λαχεῖν, obtain, obtain by lot or destiny, fall by lot.] 1. In classical myth., that one of the three Fates whose duty it was to assign to each individual his destiny; the disposer of lots. She spun the thread or course of life from the distaff held by Clotho. —2. In zoöl.: (a) A genus of very venomous American serpents of the pit-viper or rattlesnake family (Crotalidæ), having a rudimentary rattle in the form of a spine. L. mutus is the deadly bushmaster of South America. Daudin, 1802. (b) A genus of spiders now called Laches. Savigny and Audouin, 1825–27. (c) A genus of gastropods of the family Pleurotomidæ, of buccinoid figure with mammillated spire, as L. minima. Risso, 1826. (d) A genus of pseudoneuropterous insects of the family Psocidæ. Hagen, 1861. (e) A genus of buprestid beetles, erected by Saunders in 1871 upon the African L. abyla, which had been placed in Œdisternon.

Lachesis minima.

Lachninæ (lak-nī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Lachnus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Aphididæ, typified by the genus Lachnus, having six-jointed antennæ, and a winged form with twice-forked cubital veins of the fore wings. There are about 6 genera. The subfamily was framed by Passerini in 1857. By some it is considered a tribe of the subfamily Aphidinæ, under the name Lachnini.

Lachnosterna (lak-nō-stėr′nä), n. [NL., < Gr. λάχνος, λάχνη, soft woolly hair, down, + στέρνον, the breast, chest.] A genus of scarabæoid beetles of the subfamily Melolonthinæ, characterized by the transverse, not prominent anterior coxæ, narrow side-pieces of the metasternum, and claws not serrate but with a single tooth. The species are especially numerous in North America, where they are popularly known as June-bugs, dor-bugs, and May-beetles; they are crepuscular or nocturnal in habits, feeding upon the foliage of deciduous trees. The larvæ, known as white grubs, feed underground on the roots of grasses and allied plants. The species are difficult to distinguish; the most abundant are L. fusca and several near relatives, all of a brown color, with pale legs and antennæ, the upper side not hairy and rather finely punctured. See cuts under June-bug and dor-bug.

Lachnus (lak′nus), n. [NL. (Burmeister, 1835, after Illiger), < Gr. λάχνος, λάχνη, soft woolly hair, down.] A large and wide-spread genus of aphids or plant-lice, typical of the subfamily Lachninæ. They are characterized by the linear stigma and nearly straight fourth vein of the fore wing. Nearly all the many species have a woolly-looking waxy exudation, whence the name; they mostly live on trees, feeding in summer on the leaves and twigs. L. strobi, a common form, affects the white pine in the United States. Many fossil species are described, from the Florissant shales in Colorado, from the Tertiary beds of Œningen in the Rhine valley, and at Radoboj in Croatia. They often occur in amber.

lachrymable, lachrymal, etc. See lacrymable, ★etc.

lacing (lā′sing), n. [Verbal n. of lace, v.] 1. The act of binding or fastening with a cord or thong passed backward and forward through holes or around buttons or hooks.—2. A method of fastening the adjoining ends of a belt by the use of a thong or lace.—3. In bookbinding, the fastening of the boards of a book to its back by cords which pass around the sewed threads of the signatures and through holes pierced in the boards.—4. A cord used in drawing tight or fastening; laces in general.—5. Naut., the cord or rope used to lace a sail to a gaff, yard, or boom, or to fasten two parts of a sail or an awning together.—6. In ship-building, a piece of compass- or knee-timber fitted and bolted to the back of the figurehead and to its supporting piece, called the knee of the head. Also called lace-piece.—7. In mining, same as lagging, 3.—8. In the plumage of birds, especially in descriptions of standard or pure-bred poultry: (a) A border or edging of a different color from the center, completely surrounding the web of a feather. (b) The coloration of plumage resulting from feathers marked as above, considered collectively.—9. In math., a complex of three or more closed bands, so that no two are interlinked, yet so that they cannot be separated without breaking.

lacing-cutter (lā′sing-kut″ėr), n. In leather-manuf., a gaged knife by which strips of any required width may be cut.

lacinia (lā-sin'i-ä), n.; pl. laciniæ (-ē). [L., a lappet, flap, as of a garment, dewlap, a small piece or part; cf. Gr. λακίς, a rent, rending: see lacerate.] 1. In bot., a long slash or incision in a leaf, petal, or similar organ; also, one of the narrow lobes or segments resulting from such incisions.—2. In entom., the apex of the maxilla, especially when it is slender and blade-like, as in many Coleoptera. See galea, 1 (b). Kirby applied this term to the paraglossæ and labial palpi of bees, distinguishing the former as laciniæ interiores, and the latter as laciniæ exteriores. 3. [cap.] A genus of mollusks: same as Chama. Humphreys.—4. [cap.] A genus of protozoans.

laciniate (lā-sin'i-āt), a. [< NL. laciniatus*, < L. lacinia, a flap, etc.: see lacinia.] 1. Adorned with fringes.—2. In bot., irregularly cut into narrow lobes; jagged: said of leaves, petals, bracts, etc.—3. In zoöl., lacerate; slashed or jagged at the end or along the edge; incised as if frayed out; fringe-like.

laciniated (lā-sin'i-ā-ted), a. Same as laciniate.

laciniform (lā-sin'i-fôrm), a. [< L. lacinia, a flap, + forma, form.] In zoöl. and bot., fringe-like; laciniate in form: applied by Kirby to the tegulæ of insects when they are long, irregular, and like a fringe on each side of the body, as in Lithosia.

laciniola (las-i-nī'ō-lä), n.; pl. laciniolæ (-lē). [NL., dim. of lacinia.] A minute lacinia.

laciniolate (lā-sin'i-ō-lāt), a. [< NL. laciniolatus*, a dim. form of laciniatus*: see laciniate.] In bot., finely fringed; marked with minute laciniæ.

laciniose (lā-sin'i-ōs), a. Same as laciniate.

lac-insect (lak'in″sekt), n. One of several coccids, or homopterous insects of the family Coccidæ, which produce the substance called lac. Ordinary commercial lac is the product of Carteria lacca, an Asiatic species. C. larreæ, C. mexicana, and Cerococcus quercus are North American species whose lac has not become commercial. After long dispute, most chemists and entomologists are agreed that lac is a secretion of the insect, and not of the plant which the insect punctures.

lacinula (lā-sin'ū-lä), n.; pl. lacinulæ (-lē). [NL., dim. of L. lacinia, a flap: see lacinia.] In bot.: (a) A small lacinia. (b) The abruptly inflexed acumen or point of each of the petals of an umbelliferous flower.

Lacinularia (lā-sin-ū-lā'ri-ä), n. [NL., < lacinula + -aria.] A genus of tubicolous rotifers or tube-inhabiting wheel-animalcules. They have the intestine bent upon itself and opening upon the side of the body opposite to that on which the ganglion is placed, and the horseshoe-shaped trochal disk furnished with two circlets of cilia, one before and the other behind the mouth. See cut under trochal.

lacinulate (lā-sin'ū-lāt), a. In bot.: (a) Having small laciniæ. (b) Provided with lacinulæ: said of umbelliferous flowers.

Lacistema (las-i-stē'mä), n. [NL. (Swartz, 1788), < Gr. λακίς, a rent, + στῆμα, a stamen.] A genus of tropical American shrubs, constituting a family by itself, the Lacistemaceæ, having monochlamydeous hermaphrodite flowers in slender spikes which are sessile and usually fascicled in the axils of the alternate, short-petioled, entire leaves. Sixteen species have been described, ranging from Mexico and the West Indies to Brazil and Peru.

Lacistemaceæ (las-i-stē-mā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1846), < Lacistema + -aceæ.] A small family of dicotyledonous apetalous shrubs, allied to the Casuarinaceæ. The flowers are in catkin-like spikes; the fruit is a 3-valved capsule. Only a single genus, Lacistema, is known, with about 16 species; they are natives of tropical America.

Lacistemeæ (las-i-stē'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Martius, 1824), < Lacistema + -eæ.] Same as Lacistemaceæ.

lack[1] (lak), n. [Early mod. E. also lake; < ME. lak, lac, lake, lakke, defect, failing, fault (not in AS.); of LG. or Scand. origin: cf. MLG. lak = MD. lack, D. lak, blemish, stain; Icel. lakr, defective, lacking. Relations uncertain: see the verb. Prob. not connected with leak. Cf. lag[1].] 1. Want or deficiency of something requisite or desirable; defect; failure; need.

> I made some excuse by lacke of habilitie, and weakenes of bodie. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 20.
>
> And of his friends he had no lack.
> Sir Hugh of the Grime (Child's Ballads, VI. 250).

> He that gathered little had no lack. Ex. xvi. 18.
>
> Let his lack of years be no impediment.
> Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 162.

2†. Want of presence; a state of being away; absence.

> Whilst we here, wretches! wail his private lack [personal absence],
> And with vain vows do often call him back.
> Lady Pembroke (Arber's Eng. Garner, I. 264).

3†. A want; defect; a blemish; especially, a moral defect; a fault in character.

> God in the gospel grymly repreueth
> Alle that lakken [blame] any lyf, and lakkes han hemselue.
> Piers Plowman (B), x. 262.

4†. A fault committed; an offense; a censurable act.

> If I do that lakke,
> Do strepe me, and put me in a sakke,
> And in the nexte ryver do me drenche.
> Chaucer, Merchant's Tale, l. 955.

5†. Blame; reproach; rebuke; censure.

> He did not stayne ne put to lacke or rebuke his royall autoritie in geuing sentence.
> Udall, tr. of Apophthegms of Erasmus, p. 197.

lack[1] (lak), v. [< ME. lakken, lack, blame; cf. OD. laecken, fail, decrease, D. laken, blame; Dan. lakke, draw nigh, approach: see lack[1], n.] I. intrans. 1. To be wanting or deficient; come short; fail.

> Peradventure there shall lack five of the fifty righteous. Gen. xviii. 28.
>
> Ham. What hour now?
> Hor. I think it lacks of twelve.
> Shak., Hamlet, i. 4. 4.

2†. To be absent or away; be missing.

> Welle-come, Edwarde, oure son of high degre!
> Many yeeris hast thou lakkyd owte of this londe.
> Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 5.

3. To be in want; suffer need.

> The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger.
> Ps. xxxiv. 10.

II. trans. 1†. To be wanting to; fail. [Originally intransitive, the object being in the dative.]

> Hem [Hagar and Ishmael] gan that water laken.
> Gen. and Exod., l. 1231.

2. To be in want of; stand in need of; want; be without; be destitute of; fail to have or to possess. The direct object in this construction was formerly the subject, what is now the subject (nominative) being originally in the dative.

> If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God.
> Jas. i. 5.
>
> Good counsellors lack no clients.
> Shak., M. for M., i. 2. 110.
>
> "What d' ye lack?" he cried, using his solicitations. "Mirrors for your toilette, my pretty madam. . . . What d' ye lack?—a watch, Master Sergeant?"
> Scott, Fortunes of Nigel, i.

3†. To suffer the absence of; feel the deprivation of; miss.

> Thereat the feend his gnashing teeth did grate,
> And griev'd, so long to lacke his greedie pray.
> Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 34.
>
> Orl. For these two hours, Rosalind, I will leave thee.
> Ros. Alas! dear love, I cannot lack thee two hours.
> Shak., As you Like it, iv. 1. 182.
>
> I shall be lov'd when I am lack'd. Shak., Cor., iv. 1. 15.

4. To blame; reproach; speak in detraction of. [Prov. Eng.]

> No devocioun
> Hadde he to non to reven him his reste,
> But gan to preyse and lakken whom him leste.
> Chaucer, Troilus, i. 189.

5. To beat. Also lacky. [Prov. Eng.]—Syn. 2. Lack, Need, Want. These words have come to overlap each other a good deal by figurative extension, and have considerable variety of peculiar idiomatic use. To lack is primarily and generally to be without, that which is lacked being generally some one thing, and a thing which is desirable, although generally not necessary or very important.

lack[2] (lak), v. t. [Perhaps another use of lack[1], v. t., 5.] To pierce the hull of with shot. [Rare.]

> Alongside ran bold Captain John [Hawkins], and with his next shot, says his son, an eye-witness, "lacked the admiral through and through."
> Kingsley, Westward Ho, xxviii.

lacmus (lak'mus), n. [< D. lakmoes (= G. lackmus, lackmuss = Dan. Sw. lakmus), lacmus, < lak, lac, + moes, pulp. The word has been perverted to litmus, q. v.] Same as litmus.

Laconian (lā-kō'ni-an), a. and n. [< L. Laconia, a country of the Peloponnesus, < Laco(n-), Lacon, < Gr. Λάκων, an inhabitant of Lacedæmon, a Spartan. Cf. Lacedæmonian.] I. a. Pertaining to Laconia or its inhabitants; Lacedæmonian or Spartan.

II. n. An inhabitant of Laconia, a division of the Peloponnesus in Greece, anciently constituting the country of the Spartans or Lacedæmonians, now a nomarchy of the kingdom of Greece; a Lacedæmonian or Spartan. The Laconians were exceptionally distinguished for the peculiarities of character and manner which have made laconic and laconism terms of common speech in both ancient and modern times. In part of Laconia a distinct dialect of Greek, called the Tzakonian, is still spoken.

Laconic (lā-kon'ik), a. and n. [= F. laconique = Sp. lacónico = Pg. It. laconico, < L. Laconicus, < Gr. Λακωνικός, Laconian, Lacedæmonian, laconic, < Gr. Λάκων, a Laconian, an inhabitant of Lacedæmon or Sparta.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to Laconia or its inhabitants; Lacedæmonian or Spartan. [Rare.]—2. [l. c.] Expressing much in few words, after the manner of the ancient Laconians; sententious; pithy; short; brief: as, a laconic phrase.

Why, if thou wilt needs know
How we are freed, I will discover it,
And with laconic brevity.
Beau. and Fl., Little French Lawyer, v. 1.

Boccalini, in his "Parnassus," indicts a laconic writer for speaking that in three words which he might have said in two. Steele, Tatler, No. 204.

King Agis, therefore, when a certain Athenian laughed at the Lacedæmonian short swords, . . . answered in his laconic way, "And yet we can reach our enemy's hearts with them." Langhorne, tr. of Plutarch's Lycurgus.

3. [l. c.] Characteristic of the Laconians: inexorable; stern; severe. [Rare.]

The latest revolution [among the Greeks] that we read of was conducted, at least on one side, in the Grecian style, with laconic energy. J. Adams, Government, IV. 287.

Laconic meter. Same as II., 3. = Syn. 2. Condensed, Succinct, etc. See concise.

II. n. [l. c.] 1. Conciseness of language; laconicism. [Rare.]

Shall we never again talk together in laconic? Addison.

2. A concise, pithy expression; something expressed in a concise, pithy manner; a laconism: chiefly used in the plural: as, to talk in laconics. —3. In anc. pros., an anapestic tetrameter catalectic with a spondee instead of the penultimate anapest (⏑⏑ – ⏑⏑ – | ⏑⏑ – ⏑⏑ – | ⏑⏑ – ⏑⏑ – | – – ×). So called as a variety of the tetrameter used in the Laconian or Spartan embateria.

laconica, n. Plural of laconicum.

laconical (lā-kon'i-kal), a. [< laconic + -al.] Same as laconic. [Rare.]

His head had now felt the razor, his back the rod:
All that laconical discipline pleased him well.
Bp. Hall, Epistles, i. 5.

laconically (lā-kon'i-kal-i), adv. Briefly; concisely: as, a sentiment laconically expressed.

I write to you very laconically.
Pope, To Warburton, xvii.

laconicism (lā-kon'i-sizm), n. [< laconic + -ism.] 1. A laconic mode or style of expression; laconism.

I grow laconic even beyond laconicism, for sometimes I return only yes or no to questionary or petitionary epistles of half a yard long. Pope, To Swift, Aug. 17, 1736.

2. A laconic phrase or expression; a laconism.

He [the theologian] then passes to its "Sharh," or commentary, generally the work of some other savant, who explains the difficulty of the text, amplifies its Laconicisms.
R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 81.

laconicum (lā-kon'i-kum), n.; pl. laconica (-kä). [L. laconicum, a sweating-room, a sweating-bath, neut. (sc. balneum) of Laconicus, Spartan: see laconic.] In Rom. archæol., a vapor-bath; a chamber in a bathing-establishment warmed by means of air artificially heated: so called because the Laconians used such a dry or sudorific bath, avoiding the use of warm water as enervating.

laconism (lak'ō-nizm), n. [= F. laconisme = Sp. Pg. It. laconismo, < Gr. Λακωνισμός, the imitation of Lacedæmonian manners, dress, etc., esp. of their short and pointed way of talking, < Λακωνίζειν, imitate Lacedæmonian manners, etc.: see laconize.] 1. Pointed brevity of speech or expression; sententiousness; conciseness; pithiness.—2. A concise or pithy expression; an utterance conveying much meaning in few words.

laconize (lak'ō-nīz), v. i.; pret. and pp. laconized, ppr. laconizing. [< Gr. Λακωνίζειν, imitate Lacedæmonian manners, dress, etc., < Λάκων, a Lacedæmonian: see Laconic.] To imitate the Laconians, either in austerity of life or in shortness and pithiness of speech.

lac-painted (lak'pān″ted), a. Decorated with colored lacquer-work, as is much Japanese or ★Indian work.

lacquer, lacker[2] (lak'ėr), n. [Formerly also leckar; < F. lacre (Cotgrave), < Sp. lacre = Pg. lacre, sealing-wax, < laca, gum lac: see lac[2]. The spelling lacquer, in supposed imitation of the F. (cf. F. laque, formerly also lacque, lac), is now commonly used instead of the more correct lacker.] 1†. Lac as used in dyeing. [Rare.]

Enquire of the price of leckar [read lacker?], and all other things belonging to dying. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 432.

2. An opaque varnish containing lac, properly so called. Especially, a kind of varnish, consisting of shellac dissolved in alcohol, with the addition of other ingredients, particularly coloring matters. It is applied to different materials to protect them from tarnish and to give them luster, especially to brass.

3. Decorative work colored and then varnished so as to produce a hard, polished appearance like that of enamel.—4. A resinous varnish obtained from the Rhus vernicifera by making incisions in the bark. When dissolved in spring-water and mixed with other ingredients, such as gold, cinnabar, or some similar coloring matter, it is applied in successive coatings to wood-ware, imparting to it a highly polished lustrous surface.

5. Lacquer-ware; articles of wood which have been ornamented by coating with lacquer. The making of this ware is an extensive industry in China and Japan, especially in the latter country, which excels in the beauty and delicacy of the articles produced. The chief kinds are: black lacquer; gold lacquer, which is of many different shades, and, when fine, of brilliant metallic luster; and aventurin or sprinkled lacquer, in which the grains of gold are of various degrees of minuteness, and are put on sometimes in a uniform sprinkle, sometimes in cloudings. On many pieces decorated with lacquer, figures in relief of one of these kinds are applied upon a surface of another. A surface of lacquer is often adorned with pieces of gold- or silver-foil, and incrusted with small reliefs in bronze, mother-of-pearl, ivory, and other materials.—Aventurin lacquer. See def. 5.—Burmese lacquer, a lacquer yielded by the black-varnish tree, Melanorrhœa usitata.—Cashmere lacquer, a decoration applied to wood and to papier-maché in flat designs of flowers, etc., in vivid color, afterward covered with a thick, transparent varnish.—Cinnabar lacquer, a red lacquer prepared by mixing seshime lacquer with cinnabar or red sulphid of mercury.—Coral lacquer. See coral.—Foochow lacquer, a kind of lacquered ware made in China in imitation of the Japanese, but greatly inferior in make and finish. It is reputed to be the work of a family who had obtained some of the secrets of the Japanese workmen.—Gold lacquer. See gold.—Guri lacquer, a kind of lacquered ware in which layers of different colors are superimposed and a simple pattern of scrolls or the like is cut into the surface in a wedge-shaped groove, the sloping sides of which display the different layers up to the number of fifteen, or occasionally more.—Hira gold lacquer, gold lacquer which has a uniform smooth flat surface, the patterns, of whatever character, being in color in the surface itself, without relief.—Hyderabad lacquer, decoration of furniture and the like done in water-color on a ground usually of metal, such as tin-foil, and covering the whole with a thick, transparent varnish. The work is similar to that of Cashmere, but with a different chord of color; it is done chiefly in the Deccan.—Incrusted lacquer, lacquered ware the decoration of which is partly obtained by means of pieces of other material inlaid in the surface, as mother-of-pearl, ivory plain or colored, or small plaques of metal.—Iron lacquer, a Japanese lacquer in which the surface of the black lacquer is purposely roughened and stained to imitate the surface of wrought-iron.—Japan lacquer. See japan, n.—Kamakura lacquer, an ancient lacquered ware named from the city of Kamakura in Japan, the old capital of the shoguns. The pieces thought to be of this ware are in red lacquer over black, the under coat showing through the upper one irregularly, as if from wear.—Peking lacquer, a kind of lacquered ware made in China, distinguished by flowers, sprays, and the like, in relief and in full color on a background usually of gold. Incrustations of ivory and other materials are also used. A Japanese imitation of it is made, which perhaps surpasses the Chinese in delicacy.—Scratched lacquer, lacquered ware in which the surface is scratched with a point, showing the layer of color below.—Seshime lacquer, a mixture of pure lacquer with finely powdered charred wood and a glaze made from seaweed: used in Japan for priming coats. A kind obtained from the lower branches of the lacquer-tree is called ki-seshime.—Transparent lacquer, a lacquer obtained from the older lacquer-trees and used for the final coat in any work in which transparency is required, as in inlayings, or to show the grain of the wood.—Tsui-shu lacquer, a carved or embossed cinnabar lacquer-ware originally made in China, whence the best specimens still come, but introduced into Japan in the reign of Go-Tsuchi (1465–1501). The lacquer is thickly laid on in successive coats to a depth of three sixteenths of an inch or more, and then deeply carved with arabesques, flowers, birds, etc., thus differing from Kamakura lacquer, in which the wood is carved and then lacquered. There is also a black embossed or carved lacquer called tsui-koku lacquer. Guri lacquer is another variety. —Vermilion lacquer. Same as coral lacquer (which see, under coral).—Wakasa lacquer, a remarkable lacquered ware made in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in the province of Wakasa in Japan. It is clouded with many different colors, upon which as background foliage and the like in gold- or silver-leaf are added.—Yoshino lacquer, lacquered ware made at Yoshino in the province of Yamato in Japan, usually black, with patterns in different colors, especially red. It is a durable ware, and more common in articles of utility than in works of art.

lacquer, lacker[2] (lak'ėr), v. t. [< lacquer, lacker[2], n.] To varnish; treat or decorate with lacquer.

What shook the stage, and made the people stare?
Cato's long wig, flower'd gown, and lacquer'd chair.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 337.

Lacquered leather. See leather.

lacquerer (lak'ėr-ėr), n. One who applies lacquer or produces lacquered ware.

lacquering (lak'ėr-ing), n. Finish or decoration in lacquer, especially Japanese lacquer.

No time yeelds rest unto my dulcide throat,
But still I ply my lachrimable note.
M. Parker, The Nightingale.

lacrymæ Christi (lak'ri-mē kris'tī). [L. (NL.), prop. lacrimæ Christi: lacrimæ, pl. of lacrima, a tear (see lacrymal); Christi, gen. of Christus, Christ.] A strong and sweet red wine of southern Italy. Genuine lacrymæ Christi is produced only on the slopes of Mount Vesuvius, much of the wine ★sold under the name being factitious.

lacrymal, lachrymal (lak'ri-mal), a. and n. [= OF. lacrimal, lacrymal, F. lacrymal = Sp. Pg. lacrimal, lagrimal = It. lacrimale, lagrimale, < ML. lacrimalis, pertaining to tears (ML. lacrimale, n., a tear-bottle), < L. lacrima, also written lacruma, lacryma, and in ML. NL. also corruptly lachryma, in OL. dacrima (= Gr. δάκρυμα), a tear, with suffix -ma, = Gr. δάκρυ = E. tear: see tear[2]. The proper spelling of this and the related words is lacrim-; but lacrym- and the corrupt form lachrym- are in prevalent use.]

I. a. In anat. and physiol., of or pertaining to tears; secreting tears; conveying tears: as, the lacrymal apparatus.

It is of an exquisite sense, that, upon any touch, the tears might be squeezed from the lachrymal glands, to wash and clean it. G. Cheyne, Philosophical Principles.

Lacrymal bone. See lacrymal, n., 1.—Lacrymal canal, caruncle, crest. See the nouns.—Lacrymal duct, the nasal duct, conveying tears from the eye to the nose.—Lacrymal fossa, gland, etc. See the nouns.—Lacrymal sac, a dilatation of the upper extremity of the lacrymal duct.—Lacrymal sinus, the suborbital sinus or tear-bag of a ruminant, as a deer; a larmier.

LG, lacrymal gland; LD, lacrymal duct.

II. n. 1. One of the bones of the face in vertebrates; in man, the os unguis, or nail-bone, so called from its resemblance in size and shape to a human finger-nail. It is situated wholly within the orbit of the eye, on the inner side, in relation with the lacrymal or nasal duct, whence the name. In vertebrates other than man it is usually a much larger and stouter bone, situated externally upon the face, commonly forming a part of the bony brim of the orbit. It is essentially a membrane bone, forming one of a series which in some animals constitutes an outer arcade along the side of the skull, over the orbit, approximately parallel with the zygomatic arch. Also called lacrymale, os lacrymale, os unguis, and os tarsale. See cut under skull.

2. Same as lacrymatory.—3. pl. Tears; a fit of weeping. [Humorous.]

Something else I said that made her laugh in the midst of her lacrymals.
Richardson, Sir Charles Grandison, VI. 317.

It is thought that the offering of Abel, who sacrificed of his flocks, was only wool, the fruits of his shearing; and milk, or rather cream, a part of his lactage.
Shuckford, The Creation, I. 79.

lactamine (lak-tam′in), n. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + E. amine, q. v.] A colorless crystalline substance ($C_3H_7NO_2$) formed by the union of lactide and ammonia, whence the name.

lactant (lak′tant), a. [= Sp. Pg. lactante = It. lattante, < L. lactan(t-)s, ppr. of lactare, give suck: see lactate, v.] Suckling; giving suck. [Rare.]

lactarene, lactarine (lak′ta-rēn, -rin), n. [< lactar(y) + *-ene, -ine*2.] The commercial name for a preparation of the casein of milk, used by calico-printers like albumen.

lactary (lak′tā-ri), a. and n. [= F. lactaire = Sp. lactario, < L. lactarius, milky, < lac(t-), milk: see lactate, v.] I.† a. Milky; full of white juice like milk.

Yet were it no easie probleme to resolve . . . why also from lactary or milky plants which have a white and lacteous juice dispersed through every part there arise flowers blew and yellow. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., vi. 10.

II. n.; pl. lactaries (-riz). A house used as a dairy. [Rare.]

lactate (lak′tāt), v.; pret. and pp. lactated, ppr. lactating. [< L. lactatus, pp. of lactare (> It. lattare), contain milk, give suck, < lac(t-) (> It. latte = Sp. leche = Pg. leite = F. lait), milk, = Gr. γάλα (γαλακτ-), milk.] I. intrans. 1. To secrete milk.—2. To give suck or perform the function of lactation.

II. trans. To convert into milk; cause to resemble milk.

lactate (lak′tāt), n. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + *-ate*1.] In chem., a salt of lactic acid, or the acid of sour milk. The lactates are soluble in water, and many of them are uncrystallizable.

lactation (lak-tā′shon), n. [= F. lactation = Sp. lactación = Pg. lactação = It. lattazione, < NL. lactatio(n-), a giving suck, < L. lactare, give suck: see lactate, v.] 1. The formation or secretion of milk; the physiological function of secreting milk.—2. The act of giving suck, or the time of suckling.

lacteal (lak′tē-al), a. and n. [< L. lacteus, milky (see lacteous), + -al.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or resembling milk; milky.—2. Conveying a milk-like fluid; chyliferous: as, a lacteal vessel.

II. n. In anat., one of numerous minute tubes which absorb or take up the chyle (a milk-like fluid) from the alimentary canal and convey it to the thoracic duct. The lacteals are the radicles of the lymphatic system of the alimentary canal, draining off the chyle or nutritive and assimilable material from the intestine where it is elaborated, and conveying it to larger tubes in which the lacteals unite in the mesentery, whence it is taken into the receptacle which forms the beginning of the thoracic duct, to be conveyed through the latter into the subclavian vein, and so mixed directly with the current of venous blood. The lacteals are so called from the name vasa lactea applied to these vessels by their discoverer Gasparo Aselli in 1622.

lacteally (lak′tē-al-i), adv. In a lacteal manner; milkily.

lactean (lak′tē-an), a. [= OF. lactean; < L. lacteus, milky (see lacteous), + -an.] 1. Milky; resembling milk.

This lactean whiteness ariseth from a great number of little stars constipated in that part of heaven.
J. Moxon, Astron. Cards, p. 13.

2. Lacteal; conveying chyle.

lactein (lak′tē-in), n. [< L. lacteus, milky (see lacteous), + *-in*2.] A substance obtained by the evaporation of milk, concentrating its essential qualities; solidified milk. Thomas, Med. Diet.

lacteous (lak′tē-us), a. [= Sp. lácteo = Pg. lacteo = It. latteo, < L. lacteus, milky, < lac(t-), milk: see lactate, v.] 1. Milky; resembling milk.—2†. Lacteal; conveying chyle: as, a lacteous vessel.—3. In entom., white with a very slight bluish-gray tinge, like the color of milk: applied generally to white surfaces which are somewhat translucent.

lacteously (lak′tē-us-li), adv. In a lacteous manner; milkily; lacteally.

lactescence (lak-tes′ens), n. [= F. lactescence = Sp. lactescencia; as lactescen(t) + -ce.] 1. The state of being lactescent; milkiness or milky coloration.

This lactescence, if I may so call it, does also commonly ensue when, spirit of wine being impregnated with those parts of gums or other vegetable concretions that are supposed to abound with sulphureous corpuscles, fair water is suddenly poured upon the tincture or solution.
Boyle, Works, I. 219.

2. In bot., an abundant flow of juice or sap from a plant when wounded, commonly white, but sometimes yellow or red.

lactescent (lak-tes′ent), a. [= F. lactescent = Sp. Pg. lactescente, containing milk, < L. lactescen(t-)s, ppr. of lactescere, turn to milk (cf. lactare, contain milk), < lac(t-), milk: see lactate, v.] 1. Being or becoming milky; having a milky appearance or consistence.—2. In bot., abounding in a thick milky juice, as the milkweed.

Amongst the pot-herbs are some lactescent papescent plants, as lettuce and endive. Arbuthnot, Aliments, iii. 4.

3. In entom., secreting a milky fluid, as the joints of certain Coleoptera.

lactic (lak′tik), a. [= F. lactique; < L. lac(t-), milk, + -ic.] Pertaining to milk; procured from milk, or from something of a similar character.—Lactic acid, $C_3H_6O_3$, an acid which is known in three isomeric modifications, the most common one being that found in sour milk. In all three forms it is a syrupy, intensely sour liquid, forming well-defined salts. It is formed not only in milk when it becomes sour, but also in the fermentation of several vegetable juices, and in the putrefaction of some animal matters. The acid which is found in the fermented juice of beet-root, in sauer-kraut, in fermented rice-water, and in the infusion of bark used by tanners is for the most part lactic acid. It occurs also in the muscles. Also α-hydroxypropionic acid.

lacticinium (lak-ti-sin′i-um), n.; pl. lacticinia (-ä). [L., milk food, < lac(t-), milk: see lactate.] A dish prepared from milk and eggs, which, in early times forbidden, was later, in the Latin Church, to some extent permitted as food on ecclesiastical fast-days. A recent papal dispensation has made its use in the Roman Catholic Church lawful in some countries on most fast-days.

lactide (lak′tid or -tīd), n. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + E. *-ide*1.] A volatile substance, $C_6H_8O_4$, the anhydrid of lactic acid produced by the dry distillation of that acid.

lactiferous (lak-tif′e-rus), a. [= F. lactifère = Sp. lactífero = Pg. lactifero = It. lattifero, < LL. lactifer, milk-bearing, < L. lac(t-), milk (see lactate), + ferre = E. *bear*1.] 1. Bearing or conveying milk or chyle; lacteal; galactophorous: as, a lactiferous duct. See duct.—2. Producing a thick milky juice, as a plant.

lactifical (lak-tif′i-kal), a. [< lactific + -al.] Same as lactific. Coles, 1717.

lactiflorous (lak-ti-flō′rus), a. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + flos (flōr-), flower.] Having flowers white like milk. Thomas, Med. Dict.

lactifugal (lak-tif′ū-gal), a. [< lactifug(e) + -al.] Serving to check or stop the secretion of milk; having the property of a lactifuge.

lactifuge (lak′ti-fūj), n. [= F. lactifuge, < L. lac(t-), milk, + fugare, expel, < fugere, flee: see fugitive.] A medicine which checks or diminishes the secretion of milk.

lactine (lak′tin), n. [= F. lactine; < L. lac(t-), milk, + *-ine*2.] Same as lactose.

lactobutyrometer (lak-tō-bū-ti-rom′e-tėr), n. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + butyrum, = Gr. βούτυρον, butter, + Gr. μέτρον, a measure.] A kind of lactometer for ascertaining the quantity of buttery matter any particular milk contains.

lactocele (lak′tō-sēl), n. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + Gr. κήλη, tumor.] In pathol., a morbid collection of milk-like fluid. Also called galactocele.

lactocrite (lak′tō-krit), n. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + κριτής, a judge: see critic.] An apparatus for testing the quantity of fatty substance or butter in a sample of milk, invented by Laval, and used in creameries in connection with his centrifugal separator. A mixture of the milk to be tested with an equal volume of a mixture of 95 parts of strong acetic acid and 5 parts of strong sulphuric acid is heated for eight minutes in a glass or porcelain vessel. This process sets free the fatty substance of the milk, which, however, still remains diffused throughout the mass. The lactocrite is a long narrow-necked tube, fitted to a holder on a disk attached to the centrifugal separator. The prepared milk is placed in this tube, and the rotation of the centrifugal separator acts, as in the separation of cream from milk, to aggregate the fat in the narrow neck of the tube, when its quantity can be determined by a scale. When all the steps of the process are performed with exactness, the value of the sample for butter-making can be determined with an average error of only one twentieth of one per cent.

lactodensimeter (lak″tō-den-sim′e-tėr), n. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + densus, thick, dense, + Gr. μέτρον, a measure.] A kind of lactometer furnished with scales intended to show what proportion of the cream, if any, has been removed from a sample of milk by skimming.

lactometer (lak-tom′e-tėr), n. [= F. lactomètre = Sp. lactómetro = Pg. lactometro, < L. lac(t-), milk, + Gr. μέτρον, a measure.] An instrument for gaging the purity or richness of samples of milk. Specifically—(a) An instrument used in measuring the volume of cream in a sample of milk, and the probable amount of water, if any, which has been added to it. The simplest form is a graduated glass tube for measuring the amount of cream that rises from a sample of milk placed in it. A more complete instrument consists of a series of tubes each with a stop-cock at the bottom, arranged vertically in a suitable stand. The tubes are about an inch in diameter and 12 inches high, and are graduated to tenths of inches. The samples of milk to be tested are poured into separate tubes to a depth of 10 inches. The stand is then set aside and the cream allowed to rise. The thickness of the stratum of cream which rises is measured in tenths of an inch, or (as the depth is 10 inches) in hundredths of the volume tested. The separated milk is then drawn off through the stop-cock for further tests of richness in caseous matter, etc. (b) A kind of hydrometer for testing milk by its specific gravity: also called galactometer to distinguish it from the preceding, in connection with which it is commonly used. When this is called lactometer, the other instrument receives a different name, as creamometer (Encyc. Brit.), or per cent. tube (E. H. Knight). See hydrometer, and cut under galactometer. (c) Same as lactodensimeter.

lactone (lak′tōn), n. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + -one.] A cyclic anhydrid of a hydroxy acid. Lactones are most easily formed from γ- and δ-hydroxy acids.

lactophosphate (lak-tō-fos′fāt), n. [< lact(ic) + phosphate.] A phosphate combined with lactic acid.

lactoscope (lak′tō-skōp), n. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + Gr. σκοπεῖν, see.] An instrument for testing the quality and richness of samples of milk, by their comparative opacity, constructed and operated upon the principle that the richer the milk is in fatty and caseous substances the greater will be its resistance to the passage of light through a stratum of any given thickness. The samples are tested by a light of equal intensity, usually the flame of a stearin candle. A common form of lactoscope may be described as a box with two vertical parallel and polished glass sides, one of which may be moved by a screw toward or away from, and always in parallel relation with, the other. The candle is placed at a specified distance from the fixed glass side of the box, and as the movable side recedes the stratum of milk increases in thickness to a point at which the candle-flame becomes invisible through it. The various thicknesses at which this occurs in different samples are indications of the richness of the samples, provided no adulteration other than watering has been attempted. There are also lactoscopes of simpler construction and operation. (Encyc. Brit.) lactose (lak′tōs), n. [< L. lac(t-), milk, + -ose.] Sugar of milk, $C_{12}H_{22}O_{11}$, obtained by evaporating whey, filtering through animal charcoal, and crystallizing. It forms hard, white, semi-transparent trimetric crystals, which are less soluble than cane- or grape-sugar, have a slightly sweet taste, and grate between the teeth. It is dextrogyrate, and ferments slowly with yeast, but readily undergoes the lactic fermentation. It is convertible into glucose and galactose by boiling with dilute sulphuric acid. It is used for food and in medicine, and is prepared as an article of commerce in Switzerland and Bavaria. Also called galactine, lactine, and milk-sugar.

lactosuria (lak-tō-sū′ri-ą), n. [NL., < E. lactose + Gr. οὖρον, urine.] The presence of lactose in the urine.

Lactuca (lak-tū′ką), n. [L., lettuce, > ult. E. lettuce, q. v.] The genus of plants to which the lettuce belongs, type of Lessing's subtribe Lactuceæ of the family Cichoriaceæ, characterized botanically by a beaked achene and a pappus of delicate and copious bristles in many series. These plants are herbs with milky juice, usually with both radical and cauline leaves, which are generally more or less deeply cut, lobed, or pinnatifid, often with bristly ciliate margins, the cauline commonly with clasping or auriculate base. About 95 well-authenticated species are known, indigenous in Europe, Asia, Africa, and North America. The garden-lettuce, L. sativa, is scarcely known except in cultivation, but is supposed to be a native of Asia. (See lettuce.) From the European species L. virosa principally is obtained the sedative known as lactucarium, or lettuce-opium. The species of this genus all possess narcotic and sedative properties.

lactucarium (lak-tū-kā′ri-um), n. [NL., < L. lactuca, lettuce: see Lactuca.] A drug consisting of the concreted milky juice of several species of Lactuca. The species are L. virosa, L. Scariola, L. sagittata (altissima), and L. sativa, the garden-lettuce. It is regarded as possessing (in an inferior degree) the properties of opium, and can be safely used where the latter cannot; but it is uncertain in action. It is produced in some quantity in several European countries.

Lactuceæ (lak-tū′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lessing, 1832), < Lactuca + -eæ.] A subtribe of plants of the family Cichoriaceæ, of which the genus Lactuca is the type. It embraces several other genera, including Chondrilla, Prenanthes, and Sonchus. They are chiefly glabrous herbs with beaked achenia and ★copious bristly pappus.

lactucic (lak-tū′sik), a. [< L. lactuca + -ic.] Pertaining to plants of the genus Lactuca.

lacuna (lą-kū′nä), n.; pl. lacunæ (-nē). [Also rarely lacune (< F.); = F. lacune = Sp. lacuna, laguna = Pg. lacuna = It. lacuna, laguna, a pool, marsh, lake, gap, < L. lacuna, a pit, ditch, pond, hole, hollow, cavity, < lacus, a basin, cistern, lake: see lake[1]. Cf. lagoon, a doublet of lacuna.] 1. A pit or hollow. Specifically—(a) In bot.: (1) One of the small hollows or pits on the upper surface of the thallus of lichens. (2) A name given occasionally to an air space, commonly called an air-cell, lying in the midst of the cellular tissue of plants. (b) In anat., a small pit or depression; a blind alley or cul-de-sac, as one of a multitude of follicles in the mucous membrane of the urethra; especially, a cavity in bone. See below. (c) In zöol., one of the spaces left among the tissues of the lower animals which serve in place of vessels for the circulation of the fluids of the body.

2. A gap; a hiatus; especially, a vacancy caused by the omission, loss, or obliteration of something necessary to continuity or completeness.—3. [cap.] In conch., the typical genus of Lacunidæ. L. vincta is a common New England species. This small shell resembles a periwinkle, but is thinner and of slenderer form; it is of a reddish or brownish horn-color, with two or more darker spiral bands. It is found on the sea-shore, where the animal feeds on algals. —Lacunæ of bone, the microscopic cavities in the bone occupied by the bone-cells, and communicating with one another and with the Haversian canals and surfaces of the bone through the canaliculi. See cut and quotation under bone.—Lacunæ of Howship, the foveolæ of Howship, minute pits in the border of bone undergoing absorption. They are excavated by the osteoclasts lying in them.

lacunal (lą-kū′nal), a. [= It. lacunale; as lacuna + -al.] Same as lacunar[2].

lacunar[1] (lą-kū′när), n.; pl. lacunars, lacunaria (-närz, lak-ū-nā′ri-ą). [L., a wainscoted or paneled ceiling, so called from the sunken or hollowed compartments, < lacuna, a pit, hollow: see lacuna.] 1. One of the coffers or sunk compartments in ceilings or soffits formed of beams crossing one another, or resembling in structural form or for purposes of decoration such a construction of beams, as the stone ceilings of the Grecian Doric, those (generally formed of wood and plaster, and profusely decorated with gilding and ornament) common in Renaissance buildings, etc.

Lacunars.—From vaulting of Basilica of Constantine, Rome.

The lacunaria, or recesses of the roof [in the Ionic order], were also certainly painted.

J. Fergusson, Hist. Arch., I. 253.

Hence—2. A ceiling or soffit having lacunars.

lacunar[2] (lą-kū′när), a. [< lacuna + -ar[3]. Cf. lacunar[1], n., an older form.] 1. Of or pertaining to a lacuna.—2. Having lacunæ; lacunose. Also lacunal.

lacunaria, n. Latin plural of lacunar[1].

lacunary (lak′ū-nā-ri), a. [< lacuna + -ary.] ★Pertaining to a lacuna.—Lacunary function, a function having a lacunary space.—Lacunary space, in the theory of functions, an area in a plane every point of which is the affix of a value of the variable for which a given function has no determinate values. Thus, if then the space within the triangle whose vertices are the affixes of a, b, and c is a lacunary space.

$$Fx = \sum_0^\infty i \sum_0^\infty j \sum_0^\infty k \quad \frac{x^i\, y^j\, z^k}{\xi - \frac{ia + jb + kc}{i + j + k}},$$

lacune (lą-kūn′), n. [< F. lacune, < L. lacuna, a pit, hollow: see lacuna.] A lacuna; a small empty space; a gap; a hiatus; a defect. [Rare.]

A little wit, or, as that is not always at hand, a little impudence instead of it, throws its rampant briar over dry lacunes. Landor.

lacunette (lak-ū-net′), n. [< F. lacunette, dim. of lacune, a chasm: see lacuna.] In fort., a small foss or ditch.

lacunid (lak′ū-nid), n. Any member of the Lacunidæ.

Lacunidæ (lā-kū′ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lacuna, 3, + -idæ.] A family of tænioglossate gastropods, typified by the genus Lacuna, with shells resembling those of periwinkles (Littorinidæ), but having a lacuna in the columella. There is no siphonal fold, and behind the operculum are two processes, as in Rissoa. The family is usually included in the Littorinidæ.

lacunose (lā-kū′nōs), a. [= Sp. lacunoso, lagunoso = Pg. It. lacunoso, < L. lacunosus, full of hollows, holes, ponds, etc., < lacuna, a pit, a hollow: see lacuna.] Having or full of lacunæ; furrowed or pitted; marked by gaps, cavities, or depressions; specifically, in bot. and entom., having scattered, irregular, broadish, but shallow excavations, as a surface. A lacunose leaf has the venation salient beneath, leaving the surface full of hollows. The pronota and elytra of many beetles are lacunose. Also lacunous.

lacunosorugose (lak-ū-nō-sō-rō′gōs), a. [< lacunose + rugose.] In bot., marked by deep, broad, irregular wrinkles, as the shell of the walnut or the stone of the peach.

lacunous (lā-kū′nus), a. Same as lacunose.

lacunulose (lā-kū′nū-lōs), a. [Dim. of lacunose.] In bot., diminutively lacunose. Tuckerman, North American Lichens, I. 61.

lacus (lā′kus), n. [NL. use of L. lacus, a basin, lake: see lake[1].] 1. In anat., a place likened to a lake.—2. [cap.] In zoöl., a genus of beetles of the family Eucnemidæ. The sole species is L. laticornis of Brazil. Bonvouloir, 1870.—Lacus lacrymalis, the lake of tears, the oval space between the eyelids at the inner corner of the eye, occupied by the caruncula lacrymalis.

lacustral (lą-kus′tral), a. [< L. as if lacustris*, of a lake (see lacustrine), + -al.] Same as lacustrine.

lacustrian (lą-kus′tri-an), a. and n. [< L. as if lacustris*, of a lake (see lacustrine), + -an.]

I. a. Same as lacustrine.

II. n. A lake-dweller; one whose habitation is built upon a lake.

Not the slightest clew appears as to the manner in which the lacustrians disposed of their dead. Amer. Cyc., X. 112.

Lacustridæ (lą-kus′tri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < lacustris*, of a lake (see lacustrine), + -idæ.] A so-called family of fresh-water sponges, including those forms of the genus Spongilla which inhabit lakes, as distinguished from the Fluviatilidæ. Though named as a family, the group has not the taxonomic value of a genus, and its name is not based upon that of any genus.

lacustrine (lą-kus′trin), a. [< L. as if lacustris* (> It. Pg. Sp. F. lacustre), of a lake, < lacus, a lake: see lake[1].] 1. Of or pertaining to a lake or to lakes.—2. Living on or in lakes, as various animals.—3. In bot., growing in lakes or ponds. Also lacustral and lacustrian.

Lacustrine deposits, deposits formed at the bottom of lakes, which frequently consist of a series of strata disposed with great regularity one above another. From the study of these numerous fresh-water deposits geologists obtain a knowledge of the ancient condition of the land. —Lacustrine dwelling or habitation. Same as lake-dwelling.

lac-work (lak′wėrk), n. Japanese lacquer.

lacy (lā′si), a. [< lace + -y[1].] Resembling lace; lace-like.

The skeleton [of the Hexactinellidæ] comes out a lovely lacy structure of the clearest glass.

Sir C. W. Thomson, Depths of the Sea, p. 418.

How exquisite she looked in her pale-tinted dress, with a lacey shawl wound carelessly around her head and shoulders. The Century, XXXVI. 197.

lad[1] (lad), n. [Also ladd†, laddc†, ME. lad, ladde; origin unknown. Compare the late AS. Ladda as a surname (Godric Ladda in Earle, "Land Charters," p. 270). For the connection of the senses 'boy' and 'servant,' cf. boy[1] and knave in like uses. Cf. lass[1].] 1. A boy; a youth; a stripling: often used familiarly or affectionately in speaking of or to a man.

The ladde whome long I lovd so deare Nowe loves a lasse that all his love doth scorne.

Spenser, Shep. Cal., April.

Joseph, being seventeen years old, was feeding the flock with his brethren; and the lad was with the sons of Bilhah. Gen. xxxvii. 2.

The ruffling Northern lads, and the stout Welshmen try'd it. Drayton, Polyolbion, xxii. 1069.

How now, old lad? Shak., T. of the S., iv. 1. 113.

2. A male sweetheart: correlative to lass. [Scotch.]

Ye royal lasses dainty,
Heav'n mak' ye guid as weel as braw,
An' gie you lads a-plenty. Burns, A Dream.

3†. A servingman; a servant.

To make lordes of laddes of londe that he wynneth,
And fre men foule thralles that folwen nat hus lawes.
Piers Plowman (C), xxii. 32.

lad²†. An obsolete preterit and past participle of *lead*¹.

lad³ (lad), n. [Origin obscure.] A thong of leather; a shoe-latchet. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

lad-age† (lad'āj), n. Boyhood.

Heer I have past my Lad-age fair and good;
Heer first the soft Down on my chin did bud.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Vocation.

ladanum (lad'a-num), n. [< L. ladanum, ledanum, < Gr. λήδανον, a resinous juice or gum from a certain shrub, < λῆδον, > L. ledon, also lada, < Pers. lādan, a shrub (Cistus Creticus) (> Ar. Hind. lādan, ladanum). Hence, with diff. form and sense, laudanum, q. v.] A resinous juice that exudes from the Cistus ladaniferus, a shrub which grows in Spain and Portugal, and from C. Creticus and C. salvifolius, which grow in Crete, Syria, etc. The best sort occurs in commerce in dark-colored or black masses, of the consistence of a soft plaster. The other sort is in long rolls coiled up, harder than the former, and of a paler color. It was formerly much used medicinally in external applications and as a stomachic, but is now in little request. It is also used in perfumery and in fumigating-pastils. Also labdanum, laudanum, gum ladanum, gum labdanum, gum ledon.

ladany† (lad'a-ni), n. [See ladanum.] An old name for Cistus ladaniferus, one of the plants yielding ladanum.

They make here Labdanum or Ladanum of a very small balsamic aromatic shrub called Ladany, and by botanists Cistus Ledon, or Cistus ladanifera.
Pococke, Description of the East, II. 231.

★ladder (lad'ėr), n. [Also dial. ledder; < ME. laddere, laddre, < AS. hlādder, with short vowel hlædder (in declension syncopated hlædr-, hlæddr-), a ladder, = OFries. hladder, hleder = MD. ledere, D. ladder, leer = MLG. ledder, a ladder, the rails of a cart, = OHG. hleitar, hleitara, hleitra, leitera, leitra, MHG. G. leiter, a ladder; perhaps akin to L. clathri, a trellis, grate; cf. Goth. hleithra, a hut, tent, tabernacle (of wattles?) (cf. hlija, a tent, tabernacle). By some referred to the same root as Gr. κλίμαξ, a ladder, namely the root of Gr. κλίνειν = AS. hlinian, lean: see *lean*¹, clinic, climax, etc.] 1. A frame of wood, metal, or rope, usually portable, and consisting essentially of two side-pieces connected at suitable distances by cross-pieces, generally in the form of rounds or rungs, forming steps by which, when the frame is properly set, a person may ascend a height. A ladder differs from a stair in that it has treads, but no risers. There are many forms of ladders, adapted to different uses, as the step-ladder, standing-ladder, companion-ladder, collapsing-ladder, scaling-ladder, etc. A firemen's scaling-ladder is now used consisting of one pole only with steps on each side and a large barbed hook at the top. In use, the hook is caught in a window-sill, the fireman climbs to the window by the pole, and then raises it to the next window, and so on.

Firemen's Scaling-ladder.

The kyng by an laddere to the ssyp clam an hey.
Rob. of Gloucester, p. 333.

This ladder of ropes will lette thee downe.
The Child of Elle (Child's Ballads, III. 227).

Then they placed their scaling ladders,
And o'er the walls did scour amain.
Undaunted Londonderry (Child's Ballads, VII. 249).

2. Figuratively, any means of ascending; a means of rising to eminence.

Note that the Crosse becomes A Ladder leading to Heav'ns glorious rooms.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 7.

Lowliness is young ambition's ladder,
Whereto the climber-upward turns his face.
Shak., J. C., ii. 1. 22.

Accommodation ladder. See accommodation.—Extension ladder, a ladder with a sliding or folding section which can be used to increase the length.—Jacob's ladder. (a) The ladder which, according to the account in Genesis (xxviii. 12), Jacob saw in a dream, stretching from earth to heaven, with the angels of God ascending and descending upon it. (b) In logic, a figure illustrating the theory of the old logic concerning the relations of genera, differences, and species. (c) Naut. See Jacob's-ladder, 1.—Hook-and-ladder company. See hook.—Movable ladder, a miners' man-engine.

ladder-braid (lad'ėr-brād), n. A kind of braid made on the lace-pillow; a narrow bobbin-net: so named from its appearance.

ladder-carriage (lad'ėr-kar″āj), n. A hook-and-ladder truck; a vehicle on which fire-ladders are carried. In some forms the bed-frame serves as a brace for the ladder when it is raised, the sliding sections of the ladder being extended by a windlass which has its bearings at the foot of the frame. A basket may be secured by a rope to a pulley at the top of the ladder to serve as a fire-escape. E. H. Knight.

ladder-dredge (lad'ėr-drej), n. A dredge having buckets carried round on a ladder-like chain.

ladderman (lad'ėr-man), n.; pl. laddermen (-men). In a fire-brigade, a member of a hook-and-ladder company.

ladder-shell (lad'ėr-shel), n. Any species of Scalaria; a scalariid or wentle-trap: so called from the conspicuous ribs, resembling the rounds of a ladder.

ladder-sollar (lad'ėr-sol″är), n. In mining, a platform at the foot of each ladder in a ladder-way. The ladders are usually from 25 to 30 feet in length, and between each two is a sollar or platform, where the miner changes to another ladder. The object of this arrangement is to lessen the danger, to both the miner himself and his companions below, which would attend a fall from one continuous ladder leading from the top to the bottom of the shaft. Ladders without sollars are forbidden by law in England.

ladder-stitch (lad'ėr-stich), n. 1. An embroidery-stitch in which cross-bars at equal distances are produced between two solid ridges of raised work. A variety of this has the cross-bars at different angles, producing a row of lozenges or hexagons; it is also carried around curves and in a circle, the cross-bars resembling the radiating spokes of a wheel.

2. A stitch by which a row of crosses is produced, the effect of the whole being a continuous line or ridge of the silk or thread, with short cross-bars at regular intervals projecting at both sides.

ladderway (lad'ėr-wā), n. A space or opening for ascending and descending by a ladder; specifically, in mining, a shaft arranged with a system of ladders by which the miners have access to the part of the mine in which their work is carried on. In vertical shafts the ladderway (also called in England the footway) is usually arranged in a separate compartment partitioned off from those used for hoisting and pumping.

ladder-work (lad'ėr-wėrk), n. Work done on a ladder, as painting, stuccoing, and the like: a workmen's term. For such work a ladder is often slung horizontally by its ends, to make a platform.

I know he is a very amiable lad, and I do not know that she is not as amiable a laddess. Walpole, Letters, III. 243.

laddie (lad'i), n. [Dim. of *lad*¹.] A lad; a boy; a lover. [Now chiefly Scotch.]

Hobie he had but a laddies sword,
But he did more than a laddies deed.
Hobie Noble (Child's Ballads, VI. 103).

I hae a wife and twa wee laddies.
Burns, To Dr. Blacklock.

lade¹ (lād), v.; pret. laded, pp. laden, laded, ppr. lading. [< ME. laden (pret. lod, pp. laden), < AS. hladan (pret. hlōd, pp. hladen), load, heap up, draw out (water), = OS. hladan = OFries. hlada = MD. D. laden, MLG. laden = OHG. hladan, MHG. G. laden, load, = Icel. hladha = Dan. lade = Sw. ladda = Goth. hlathan* (in comp. af-hlathan), load, lade. Cf. Russ. klade, a load. ladybird (lā′di-bėrd), n. [< lady, with ref. to "Our Lady," i. e. the Virgin Mary, + bird[1]; prob. orig. as a var. of ladybug.] 1. A beetle of the family Coccinellidæ, order Coleoptera, so called from its graceful form and delicate coloration. The eggs are laid in small clusters, and the larvæ are for the most part carnivorous, feeding upon plant-lice, bark-lice, and small insects of all sorts; a few, however, eat the leaves of plants. The adult beetles are in the main predaceous, but sometimes feed upon pollen. Both the beetles and the young are of great value in destroying scale-insects and plant-lice. The famous Vedalia cardinalis cleaned the orange-trees of California of the Icerya scale. The pupa is usually formed within the last larval skin, which is suspended by its anal end to some leaf or other object. The pupæ and also the larvæ of some species have been known to winter over, but the beetles usually hibernate. The species are very numerous. Also called ladybug, ladyclock, ladycow, ladyfly.

And, like the Ariosto of the North,
Sang ladye-love and war, romance and knightly worth.
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 40.

ladymeat† (lā′di-mēt), n. See the quotation.

Many an alms was given for her sake; and the food so set aside in almost every house to be bestowed upon the poor went by the name of Ladymeat. The victuals given to the poor in honour of the Blessed Virgin were often known by the above name.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. i. 284.

lady's-bedstraw (lā′diz-bed′strâ), n. A plant, Our Lady's bedstraw, Galium verum.

lady's-bower (lā′diz-bou″ėr), n. The virgin's-bower of Europe, Clematis Vitalba. Also called traveler's-joy.

lady's-comb (lā′diz-kōm), n. A small annual umbelliferous plant of Europe, Scandix Pecten-Veneris, with umbels of small white flowers, and pale-green finely divided leaves, growing in cultivated fields. The fruit is laterally compressed and destitute of vittæ, or oil-vessels; it has long and sharp points, to which the name alludes. Also called Venus's-comb and shepherd's-needle.

lady's-cushion (lā′diz-kụsh″on), n. The thrift, Statice Armeria, a maritime plant with a dense cushion-like growth: also called sea-cushion. Several other plants have sometimes been named lady's-cushion.

lady's-delight (lā′diz-dē-līt″), n. The pansy, Viola tricolor.

Ladies'-delights and periwinkles.
S. O. Jewett, A Country Doctor, p. 237.

lady's-eardrops (lā′diz-ēr′drops), n. The common cultivated fuchsia.

lady's-finger (lā′diz-fing″gėr), n. 1. pl. The kidney-vetch, Anthyllis Vulneraria. The name has also been given to many other plants.—2. One of the hairy appendages of the legs of lobsters, attached to the base of the leg. They are the gills or branchiæ. See exopodite.—3. A kind of confectioners' cake, or of sponge-cake, so named from the long and slender form.

"Fetch me that Ottoman, and prithee keep Your voice low," said the Emperor, "and steep
Some lady's fingers nice in Candy wine."
Keats, Cap and Bells, st. 48. (Davies.)

4. A finger-shaped variety of the potato formerly common, small, white, and of delicate flavor.—5. A variety of apple.

Also ladyfinger.

lady's-glove (lā′diz-gluv), n. The purple foxglove, Digitalis purpurea. The name is also given to one or two other plants, as Inula conyza.

lady's-gown (lā′diz-goun), n. In Scots law, a gift sometimes made by a purchaser to a vendor's wife on her renouncing her life-rent in her husband's estate.

lady's-hair (lā′diz-hâr), n. 1. The quaking-grass, Briza media.—2. One of the maidenhair ferns, Adiantum Capillus-Veneris.

ladyship (lā′di-ship), n. [< lady + -ship.] The condition or rank of a lady.—Her or your ladyship, a form used in speaking of or to a woman having the title of Lady.

I did what your Ladyship commanded me at Yorkhouse. Howell, Letters, I. v. 23.

lady-slipper (lā′di-slip″ėr), n. See lady's-slipper.

lady's-maid (lā′diz-mād), n. A female attendant upon a lady.

lady's-mantle (lā′diz-man″tl), n. An Old World rosaceous herb, Alchemilla vulgaris. It has a bitterish, astringent taste, and was formerly used in medicine as an astringent.

lady's-seal (lā′diz-sēl), n. 1. A plant, Tamus communis, of the family Dioscoreaceæ. It is a perennial climber, with greenish-white flowers and scarlet berries, growing in hedges and woods in England, and widely distributed on the continent. Also called black bryony.

2. The Solomon's-seal of England, Polygonatum multiflorum.

lady's-slipper (lā′diz-slip″ėr), n. 1. Any orchid of the genus Cypripedium. In America the most conspicuous wild lady's-slippers are the larger yellow, C. hirsutum; the smaller yellow, C. parviflorum; the showy, C. reginæ; and the stemless, C. acaule. The roots of the first two yield an officinal remedy regarded as a gentle nervous stimulant and antispasmodic.

2. The garden-balsam, Impatiens Balsamina. [U. S.] The name has also been given locally to other plants.

lady's-smock (lā′diz-smok), n. A cruciferous plant, Cardamine pratensis. Also called cuckoo-flower. Commonly called lady-smock.

Daisies pied and violets blue,
And lady-smocks all silver-white.
Shak., L. L. L., v. 2. 905.

That meadow, chequered with water-lilies and lady-smocks. I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 58.

lady's-thistle (lā′diz-this″l), n. 1. The blessed thistle, Cnicus benedictus.—2. The milk-thistle, Mariana Mariana.

lady's-thumb (lā′diz-thum), n. The common persicaria, Polygonum Persicaria: so called from its dense oblong reddish spike. [U. S.]

lady's-tresses (lā′diz-tres″ez), n. An orchid, Gyrostachis spiralis; also, any orchid of that genus. These orchids are low plants, notable for their spikes of white spirally arranged flowers. In the United States G. cernua is perhaps the best-known species.

Lælaps (lē′laps), n. [NL., < L. Lælaps, the name of a dog in Ovid's "Metamorphoses," < Gr. λαῖλαψ, a dark, furious storm, a hurricane.] 1. In zoöl., a generic name used in various senses. (a) A genus of arachnidans. Koch, 1835. (b) A genus of hymenopterous parasites, of the chalcid subfamily Pteromalinæ, with several West Indian and South American species. Usually Lelaps, as Walker, 1843. (c) A genus of gigantic dinosaurian reptiles, established by Cope in 1866. Some of the species stood 18 feet high, and they were shaped like kangaroos, progressing on their plantigrade hind feet with the assistance of the massive tail. The jaws were large and armed with sharp teeth. The animals were carnivorous and rapacious to a high degree.

2. [l. c.] A species or an individual of the genus Lælaps (c).

When hunting, the lælaps probably wandered around the lowlands, or swam along the shore until it arrived within twenty-five or thirty feet of its victim, when with a spring it cleared the distance. Stand. Nat. Hist., III. 467.

Lælia (lē′li-ạ), n. [NL. (Lindley, 1830), named after Lælius, a Roman statesman.] An untenable name for Læliorchis, a genus of orchidaceous plants of the tribe Epidendreæ, having the sepals and petals flat, the lateral lobes of the lip broad and loosely investing the column, and the flowers large and showy. They are epiphytes furnished with pseudobulbs, which are often elongate and stem-like, and coriaceous or fleshy leaves. The flowers are borne on simple terminal racemes. About 20 species have been discovered, inhabiting tropical America.

Læliеæ (lē-lī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), < Lælia + -eæ.] A subtribe of orchidaceous plants of the tribe Epidendreæ, chiefly epiphytes with terminal inflorescence, the pollinia in one or two series of four. It embraces 15 genera besides Lælia, the type, including Epidendrum, Cattleya, etc. Written Læliadæ by Lindley.

læmodipod (lē-mod′i-pod), a. and n. [As Læmodipoda.] I. a. Pertaining to the Læmodipoda, or having their characters. Also læmodipodous.

II. n. A member of the order Læmodipoda. Also læmodipodan.

Læmodipoda (lē-mō-dip′ō-dạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of læmodipus, < Gr. λαιμός, the throat, + δίπους (διποδ-), two-footed: see dipode, Dipus.] An order of edriophthalmous crustaceans, related to the amphipods, by some made a group of Amphipoda. It is characterized by having the abdomen rudimentary, reduced to a mere papilla, the first two thoracic somites coalesced with the head, so that the corresponding pairs of limbs seem to be attached to this part, branchial vesicles on several thoracic somites, and in the female laminar oöstegites for carrying the ova. The group consists of two families, Cyamidæ and Caprellidæ, or the whale-lice and the mantis- or specter-shrimps. These animals are marine and parasitic. The Læmodipoda were at one time made a part of the Isopoda, corresponding to a section, Cystibranchiæ, of that order. They were later raised to ordinal rank, and divided by Latreille into Filiformia and Ovalia, which divisions correspond to the modern families Caprellidæ and Cyamidæ. See these words. Also spelled Lemodipoda.

læmodipodan (lē-mō-dip′ō-dạn), a. and n. Same as læmodipod.

læmodipodiform (lē-mō-dip′ō-di-fôrm), a. [< NL. læmodipus (see Læmodipoda) + L. forma, form.] In entom., resembling the Læmodipoda in shape: an epithet applied by Kirby to certain orthopterous larvæ with elongate, subcylindrical bodies, long antennæ, and the anterior legs distant from the intermediate ones, as the Phasmidæ or walking-sticks.

læmodipodous (lē-mō-dip′ō-dus), a. [< NL. læmodipus: see Læmodipoda.] Same as læmodipod.

lænt, n. [AS. lǣn, a loan, grant, fee, fief: see loan[1].] In anc. Eng. law, the tenure of land as a benefice, either by mere permission, as in the case of the ordinary læn, where the tenant was dependent on the will of the lord, and protected only by custom, or by a writing called a book (bōk), expressing the terms of the tenure and the right of the tenant. The tenant paid for the use either in money, in produce, or in labor, frequently in all. At the expiration of the tenancy, which was usually for life, the land reverted to the grantor.

læna (lē′nạ), n.; pl. lænæ (-nē). [L., = Gr. χλαῖνα, a cloak.] In anc. Rom. costume, a woolen cloak usually of two thicknesses of cloth, worn over the pallium or the toga as a protection from the weather. It occurred in an ornamented form as an early robe of state, and also formed part of the costume of office of the flamens. In late times it was worn to some extent as a substitute for the toga.

læn-land†, n. [AS., lǣnland, lānland, < lǣn, a grant (see læn), + land, land.] In Anglo-Saxon law, land held and occupied by virtue of a læn.

Either bookland or folkland could be let, lent, or leased out by its holders; and, under the name of lænland, held by free cultivators. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 36.

læotropic (lē-ō-trop′ik), a. [As læotrop-ous + -ic.] Sinistral; turning or turned to the left, as the whorls of a spiral shell: opposed to dexiotropic.

læt (AS. pron. lat), n. [AS. læt.] Among the Anglo-Saxons, one of a class inferior to that of a ceorl, but above that of a slave. See freeman, 3.

Lætare (lē-tā′rē), n. [So called from the first word of the introit of the mass on this day. L. lætare, 2d pers. sing. impv. of lætari, rejoice, < lætus, joyful, glad.] Eccles., the fourth Sunday in Lent. It is on this Sunday that the Pope blesses the golden rose. Also called Mid-Lent Sunday.

lævigate, lævigatous, a. See levigate[1].

lævoglucose, lævogyrate, etc. See levoglucose, etc.

lafayette (lä-fā-yet′), n. [So named because it first became well known about the time of the last visit of Lafayette to the United States (1824–5).] 1. A sciænoid fish of the northern Lafayette (Liostomus xanthurus).

United States, Liostomus xanthurus, of an oblong form, with the back elevated toward the front, a steep profile, and no teeth in the lower jaw. The sides are marked with about 16 dark bands tending obliquely forward, and a distinct spot on the shoulder. Although of small size, it is much esteemed for the savoriness of its flesh. Also known as goody, old-wife, and spot.

2. A stromateoid fish, Poronotus triacanthus; the butter-fish, dollar-fish, or harvest-fish. See cut under butter-fish.

lafe†, n. A Middle English form of lave[3].

laff[1], v. An obsolete or dialectal spelling of laugh.

laff[2] (laf), n. A fish of the family Synanceidæ, Synanceia verrucosa, of an oblong form, with a monstrous cuboid head, warty skin, and a dorsal with 13 pungent spines and 6 rays. The dorsal spines are grooved and connected with an ovoid poison-gland. The fish is consequently much dreaded. It inhabits the Indian ocean, and is called laff or mud-laff at Mauritius. Also called fi-fi.

When a laff is discovered, the wary fisherman, knowing it to be a sluggish fish, not likely to move quickly, creeps slowly up to it, and stooping down lowers his hand gently till it is below the level of the mouth, when with a sudden jerk he clutches it by the lower jaw and draws it up.
Sci. Amer., N. S., LX. 227.

Laffitte (lä-fit'), n. See Château Laffitte, under château.

laft[1]†. A Middle English preterit and past participle of leave[1].

laft[2] (laft), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of loft.

I . . . observed a peeress from her seat in front of the laft opposite to me, speaking vehemently to a fat lord at the table below. Galt, The Steam-Boat, p. 220.

lafter (lâf'tèr), n. [Also laiter, lawter, lutter, lighter, Sc. lachter, lauchter, a number of eggs laid, < Icel. lāttr, lātr, the place where animals, esp. seals, whales, etc., lay their young; < liggia (pret. lā), lie, > lag, a laying, etc., leggja, lay: see lie[1] lay[1]. Lafter stands for lauchter, for laughter*, and is related to lie[1], lay[1], as slaughter to slay[1].] The number of eggs laid by a hen before she sits. Halliwell. [North. Eng.]

lag[1] (lag), a. and n. [Prob. < W. llag, slack, loose, sluggish, languid, = Corn. lac, loose, remiss, = Gael. lag, feeble; cf. L. laxus, loose, lax (see lax[1]), languere, be weak or languid: see languid[1], languish. Icel. lakra, lag, is appar. connected with lakr, defective, and thus with E. lack[1]: see lack[1].] I.† a. 1. Slow; tardy; late; coming after or behind.

Some tardy cripple bore the countermand,
That came too lag to see him buried.
Shak., Rich. III., ii. 1. 90.

2. Long delayed; last.

I could be well content
To entertain the lag-end of my life
With quiet hours. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., v. 1. 24.

We prevent
The loathsome misery of age, beguile
The gout and rheum, that in lag hours attend
For grey approachers.
Fletcher (and another), Two Noble Kinsmen, v. 4.

II. n. 1†. One who or that which comes behind; the last comer; one who hangs back.

What makes my ram the lag of all the flock?
Pope, Odyssey, ix. 526.

2†. The lowest class; the rump; the fag-end.

The senators of Athens, together with the common lag of people. Shak., T. of A., iii. 6. 89.

3. In mech., the amount of retardation of some movement: as, the lag of the valve of a steam-engine.

No unexceptionable experimental proof has ever been given that there is any such thing as a true magnetic lag; the apparent magnetic sluggishness of thick masses of iron is demonstrably due to internal induced currents.
S. P. Thompson, Dynamo-Elect. Mach., p. 74.

4. In mach., one of the strips which form the periphery of a wooden drum, the casing of a carding-machine, or the lagging or covering of a steam-boiler or -cylinder.—5. An old convict. [Australia.]

At last he fell in with two old lags who had a deadly grudge against the captain.
C. Reade, Never too Late to Mend, ix.

Hang lag†. See hang, v. i.

lag[1] (lag), v.; pret. and pp. lagged, ppr. lagging. [< lag[1], a.] I. intrans. To move slowly; fall behind; hang back; loiter; linger.

Now in the rearward comes the duke and his;
Fortune in favour makes him lag behind.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., iii. 3. 34.

Superfluous lags the veteran on the stage.
Johnson, Vanity of Human Wishes.

To this, Idomeneus: The fields of fight
Have prov'd thy valour, and unconquer'd might;
And were some ambush for the foes design'd,
Ev'n there, thy courage would not lag behind.
Pope, Iliad, xiii.

II. trans. 1†. To slacken.

The hunter with an arrow wounded him in the leg, which made him to halt and lag his flight.
Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels (1635), p. 98.

2. To clothe, as a steam-boiler, to prevent radiation of heat.

One [cylinder] which is well lagged or covered with non-conducting material. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 488.

3. To bring into the hands of justice; cause to be punished for a crime. [Low slang.]

"He is my brother on one side of the house, at least," said Lord Etherington, "and I should not much like to have him lagged for forgery." Scott, St. Ronan's Well, xxxi.

They'll ask no questions after him, for fear they should be obliged to prosecute, and so get him lagged.
Dickens, Oliver Twist, xvi.

lag[2]† (lag), v. t. [Origin obscure.] To take; steal. [Old slang.]

Some corne away lag
In bottle and bag;
Some steele for a jest
Eggs out of the nest.
Tusser, Husbandrie, November's Abstract.

lagaman†, lageman†, n. [< ML. (AL.) lagamannus, lagemannus, < ME. lageman, lagamon, lahman, < AS. lahmann, a lawman: see lawman.] In old Eng law, a man vested with or at least qualified for the exercise of jurisdiction, or sac and soc. See lawman.

lagam-balsam (lag'am-bâl'sam), n. The product of a dipterocarpaceous tree of Sumatra, closely resembling gurjun-balsam.

lagan (lag'an), n. See ligan.

lagartot (la-gär'tō), n. [Sp., a lizard, an alligator: see alligarta, alligator.] An alligator.

We saw in it [the Orinoco] divers sorts of strange fishes of marvellous bigness, but for lagartos it excelled.
Raleigh, Discovery of Guiana. (E. D.)

Lagascea (la-gas'ē-ä), n. [NL. (Cavanilles, 1800), after Prof. M. Lagasca, director of the Botanical Garden at Madrid.] A name proposed for a genus of composite plants now referred to Nocca, of the tribe Helianthea, type of the subtribe Lagascea, remarkable in having only a single flower in a head, but the heads themselves aggregated into a subglobose glomerule, and the proper involucre united into a 5-cleft tube. They are hairy or scabrous herbs or shrubs with entire or dentate opposite leaves, or the upper alternate, and white, yellow, or red flowers. Eight species are known, all natives of Mexico and Central America: one of them (Nocca mollis) is also found in nearly the whole of tropical America, and is naturalized in eastern tropical countries.

Lagascese (lag-a-sē'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1873), < Lagascea + -eæ.] A subtribe of helianthoid composite plants, consisting of the anomalous genus Lagascea (Nocca).

lag-bellied (lag'bel'id), a. Having a slack, drooping belly.

From the lag-bellied toad
To the mammoth. Hood, Lycus the Centaur.

laget, v. t. [Origin obscure.] To wash. [Old slang.]

laget, n. [< lage, v.] Poor, thin drink. [Old slang.]

I bowse no lage, but a whole gage
Of this I bowse to you. Brome, Jovial Crew, ii.

lagoman†, n. See lagaman.

lagena (lā-jē'nä), n.; pl. lagenæ (-nē). [L., also written lagœna, lagœna, lagona; < Gr. λάγυος (in late writers also λάγηνος, after L.), a flask, bottle.] 1. (a) In Rom. antiq., a wine-vase; an amphora. (b) A vase of bottle-shaped form, generally in unfamiliar wares, as Levantine, Persian, or the like.—2. The saccular extremity of the cochlea in some of the vertebrates below mammals, as a bird, where ramify the ultimate filaments of the auditory nerve.—3. [cap.] In zoöl.: (a) The typical genus of Lagenidæ. Forms of foraminifers referred to this genus are found from the Carboniferous to the present period. (b) A genus or subgenus of mollusks of the family Fasciolariidæ.

Lagenaria (laj-ē-nā'ri-ä), n. [NL., < L. lagena, a flask, + -aria.] A genus of plants of the family Cucurbitaceæ. There is only one species, L. lagenaria, which occurs throughout tropical and subtropical Asia and Africa, where it is commonly cultivated. It is a downy annual climbing herb, with broad leaves and large white flowers. The fruit is extremely variable in size and shape: it is known as the bottle-, club-, or trumpet-gourd. See gourd.

Lagenidæ (lā-jen'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lagena + -idæ.] A family of perforate foraminifers, typified by the genus Lagena. The test is calcareous, and either monothalamous or consisting of a number of chamberlets joined in a straight, curved, spiral, alternating, or (rarely) branching series. The aperture is terminal, and simple or radiate. There is no interseptal skeleton and no canal system. The Lagenidæ are marine microscopic organisms, more or less lageniform in shape.

Lagenidea (laj-ē-nid'ē-ä), n. pl. [NL.] The Lagenidæ regarded as an order, and divided into Lagenina, Polymorphina, and Ramulinina.

lageniform (lā-jen'i-fôrm), a. [< L. lagena, a flask, + forma, form.] In bot. and zoöl., shaped like a Florence flask; much dilated or subglobose at base, but ending in a slender cylinder or neck.

Thus the shell of Nodosaria is obviously made up of a succession of lageniform chambers.
W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 479.

Lageninæ (laj-ē-nī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Lagena + -inæ.] A subfamily of Lagenidæ, having a single-chambered test.

Lagenorhynchus (lā-jē-nō-ring'kus), n. [NL., < L. lagena, Gr. λάγηνος, a bottle, + Gr. ῥύγχος, a snout.] A genus of bottle-nosed dolphins, belonging to the subfamily Delphininæ, having 80 to 90 vertebræ, small teeth, and a comparatively short and broad snout, as the white-

Young Skunk-porpoise (Lagenorhynchus acutus).
(From Report of U. S. Fish Commission, 1884.)

beaked and white-sided dolphins, L. albirostris and L. acutus or leucopleurus. The characteristic coloration is blackish with white stripes, whence some of the species are called skunk-porpoises. The species are at least nine in number, but their synonymy is confused. The one here figured, properly called L. acutus, is also known as L. leucopleurus, L. gubernator, and by other names. J. E. Gray, 1846.

lager (lä'gèr), n. [< G. lager, an abbr. of lagerbier, lager-beer: see lager-beer.] Same as lager-beer (which see, under beer[1]). [U. S.]

lager-beer (lä'gèr-bēr'), n. [< G. lagerbier, lit. 'store-beer,' < lager, a storehouse, magazine, a place where things lie in store (= AS. leger, a bed, couch, E. lair: see lair[1] and leaguer[2]), + bier = E. beer[1].] See beer[1].

Lagerstræmia (lā-gèr-strē'mi-ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus), named after Magnus von Lagerström, a director of the East India Company at Gothenburg.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous trees and shrubs belonging to the family Lythraceæ and tribe Nesæeæ. They have a campanulate 6-parted calyx, 6 petals, numerous stamens, a 3- to 6-celled, 3- to 6-valved capsule, and large winged seeds. The leaves are mostly opposite and in two rows, petioled, oblong or ovate, entire, and often glaucous underneath, and the flowers are in ample terminal and axillary branching panicles. About 30 species are known, natives of tropical eastern Asia, subtropical Australia, and Africa. Five or six species are cultivated, notably L. Indica, the crape-myrtle or Indian lilac, a hardy shrub, native of China, with bright rose-colored flowers borne in great profusion and exceedingly beautiful. L. speciosa, native of India, is called bloodwood, jarool, and queen's-flower. See these words.

Lagerstræmieæ (lā-gèr-strē-mī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1826), < Lagerstræmia + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Lythraceæ, founded on the genus Lagerstræmia.

Lagetta (lā-jet'ä), n. [NL. (A. L. Jussieu, 1789), < lagetto, the native name of the tree in Jamaica.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous trees of the West Indies, belonging to the family Daphnaceæ and tribe Daphneæ. It is characterized by hermaphrodite tetramerous, loosely spiked or racemed flowers, and by having the four broad scales of the urceolate persistent perianth connivent under the stamens. These trees have beautifully reticulated bark, broad, oblong, alternate leaves, and white flowers. Three species are known, all confined to the West Indies. L. lintearia is the lacebark-tree.

Lagetteæ (lā-jet'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Meisner, 1836), < Lagetta + -eæ.] An old tribe of the Daphnaceæ, founded on the genus Lagetta.

laggan (lag'an), n. [Hind.] In India, a basin with pierced cover into which water is poured from the lota to wash the hands after a meal.

laggard (lag'ärd), a. and n. [< lag[1] + -ard.] I. a. Slow; sluggish; backward.

Thy humblest reed could more prevail,
Had more of strength, diviner rage,
Than all which charms this laggard age.
Collins, Odes, xii.

Weak minstrels of a laggard day,
Skilled but to imitate an elder page.
Scott, Don Roderick, Int., st. 3.

II. n. One who lags; a loiterer; a lazy, slack fellow.

A laggard in love, and a dastard in war.
Scott, Young Lochinvar.

Here comes a laggard hanging down his head,
Who seems no bolder than a beaten hound.
Tennyson, Geraint.

laggen (lag'en), n. [Origin obscure.] The angle between the side and the bottom of a wooden dish. [Scotch.]

But or the day was done, I trow,
The laggen they hae clautet Fu' clean that day. Burns, A Dream.

★ lagger[1] (lag'ėr), n. [< lag[1] + -er[1].] A laggard.

Whether you prove a lagger in the race,
Or with a vigorous ardour urge your pace,
I shall maintain my usual rate, no more.
Francis, tr. of Horace's Epistles, ii., To Lollius.

lagger[2] (lag'ėr), n. [Prob. a dial. var. of layer, as ligger of lier[1].] 1. A narrow strip of ground. ★—2. A green lane. [Prov. Eng. in both senses.]

lagging (lag'ing), n. [Verbal n. of lag[1], v.] 1. The act of walking or moving slowly, or of falling behind.—2. In arch., the planking, consisting of narrow strips, extending from one rib of the centering of an arch, vault, or tunnel to another, and affording direct support to the voussoirs until the arch or vault is closed in.—3. In mining, strips of wood or light timbers laid across the stulls in the drifts to prevent fragments of rock from falling through. In some coal-mines bars or rails of iron are used for this purpose, and give an important increment of strength to the construction. Sometimes called lacing.

4. In mach., a layer or layers of non-conductors of heat placed on the outside of hot chambers to prevent loss of heat by radiation. In England called deading.—Lagging of the tide, the delay in the occurrence of the tide after the time when the lunar tide alone should occur, caused by the deformation of the lunar tide by the solar tide. See priming of the tide.

laggingly (lag'ing-li), adv. In a lagging manner; loiteringly.

lag-goose (lag'gös), n. 1. The graylag: more fully called gray lag-goose or graylag goose. See graylag.—2†. A laggard. Davies.

Beware of Gill Laggoose, disordering thy house,
Mo dainties who catcheth than crafty fed mouse!
Tusser, Husbandrie, Dinner Matters.

lagh†, n. A Middle English form of law[1].

Lagidium (lā-jid'i-um), n. [NL., < Gr. λαγίδιον, dim. of λαγώς, λαγός, a hare.] A genus of alpine rodents of the family Chinchillidæ; the South American chinchas or rabbit-squirrels. They are like chinchillas, but have long ears, long bushy tail, and 4 toes instead of 5 on the fore feet. Two species inhabit the Andes of Chili, Bolivia, and Peru; these are L. cuvieri and L. pallipes. Also called Lagotis. Bennett, 1833.

lag-link (lag'lingk), n. A link for holding a lag (a bar, plank, etc.), as one of the links in an endless chain through each link of which a bar is passed, used in a form of bark-conveyer for tan-bark.

lag-machine (lag'ma-shēn″), n. A machine for shaping wooden lags or cleading for jacketing steam-pipes or cylinders, or for covering drums.

lagnappe (lan-yap'), n. [Louisiana F. lagnappe, lagniappe, prop. la gnappe, Sp. la ñapa: see napa.] An article added gratis to a purchase in shops or markets to encourage custom; any complimentary present from a dealer to a customer. [Louisiana.]

The pleasant institution of napa—the petty gratuity added by the retailer to anything bought—grew the pleasanter, drawn out into Gallicized lagnappe.
★ G. W. Cable, Creoles of Louisiana, xvi.

Lagoa (lā-gō'ä), n. [NL. (Harris, 1841), irreg. < Gr. λαγώς, Ionic λαγός, a hare.] A notable North American genus of bombycid moths, belonging to the Megalopygidæ. The larvæ are of remarkable form, resembling oval bits of curly brown or yellowish hair. Beneath their long silky hairs are concealed sharp spines, which produce a severe nettling effect upon the skin of one handling them. The cocoons mimic knots on twigs. Several species are known, the most abundant being L. crispata.

Lagocephalus (lag-ō-sef'a-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. λαγώς, a hare, + κεφαλή, head.] A genus of gymnodont fishes of the family Tetrodontidæ; the rabbit-fishes. L. lævigatus is one of the largest species of the family, attaining a length of 3 feet; it is common in the Gulf of Mexico and West Indian waters, and is known as the tambor or smooth puffer. See cut under Tetrodontidæ.

Lagodon (lā-gō'dọn), n. [< Gr. λαγώς, a hare, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of spa-roid fishes, related to the scup and sheepshead. L. rhomboides is a United States species called pinfish, and also bream. The genus is often included in Diplodus.

Pinfish, or Bream (Lagodon rhomboides).

Lagœcia (lā-gē'shiä), n. [NL. (Linnæus), so called because the umbellets are fancifully likened to a hare's nest; < Gr. λαγώς, λαγός, a hare, + οἶκος, a house.] A genus of umbelliferous plants of the tribe Lagœcieæ. They have but one style, setose fruit, pinnate leaves with awn-pointed teeth, and subglobose, many-flowered umbels with pectinate pinnatifid bracts. There is only one species, L. cuminoides, the wild cumin, native of the Mediterranean region from Spain to Syria. It has white flowers, and is sometimes cultivated in gardens. See cumin.

Lagomorpha (lag-ọ-môr'fä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λαγώς, a hare, + μορφή, form, shape.] The series or alliance of duplicidendate rodents, conterminous with the suborder Duplicidentata, and containing the two families Leporidæ and Lagomyidæ, or hares and pikas, which are thus together contrasted with Myomorpha, Sciuromorpha, and Hystricomorpha. The characters are the same as those of the suborder Duplicidentata.

lagomorphic (lag-ọ-môr'fik), a. [< Lagomorpha + -ic.] Having the form or structure of a hare; leporine, in a broad sense; duplicidentate, as a rodent; of or pertaining to the Lagomorpha, as a hare or pika.

lagomyid (lā-gom'i-id), n. A rodent of the family Lagomyidæ; a pika.

Lagomyidæ (lag-ọ-mī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lagomys + -idæ.] A family of lagomorphic or duplicidentate rodents, of the order Glires or Rodentia; the pikas, conies, or calling-hares. The dental formula is: i. $\frac{2}{2}$, c. $\frac{0}{0}$, pm. $\frac{3}{2}$ (rarely $\frac{1}{1}$), m. $\frac{3}{3} \times 2 =$ 26 (or 22) teeth. The incisors are grooved and notched. The fore and hind limbs are of proportionate lengths; the clavicles complete; the ears large and rounded; the eyes small; the whiskers copious; the fore paws have clawed digits; the hind feet are four-toed; the tail is rudimentary. The pelage is soft and dense. The general aspect is rather that of a guinea-pig than that of a hare. Lagomys is the only living genus. The name is antedated by Ochotona and the family name should be Ochotonidæ.

Lagomyinæ (lā-gō-mi-ī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Lagomys + -inæ.] The Lagomyidæ rated as a subfamily of Leporidæ. Properly Ochotoninæ.

Lagomys (lā-gō'mis), n. [NL., < Gr. λαγώς, λαγός, a hare, + μῦς = E. mouse.] The typical genus of Lagomyidæ. There are several species, all inhabiting boreal and alpine regions of the northern hemisphere, such as L. alpinus of Europe and Asia, L. ogotona of Asia, and L. princeps of America. The last is known as the little chief hare, cony, and starved rat. It inhabits British Columbia and other species occur in California, Colorado, etc. In the lower latitudes it is found only at great altitudes. Antedated by Ochotona. See pika.

lagon†, n. An obsolete variant of ligan.

lagonite (lag'ọ-nīt), n. [< lagoon (It. lagone) + -ite[2].] A hydrous ferric borate occurring as an earthy incrustation, of a yellow color, in the Tuscan lagoons.

lagoon (la-gön'), n. [Also lagune, two forms of same ult. origin being concerned: (1) Also written lagune (= F. lagune), < It. laguna = Sp. laguna, Pg. lagoa, < L. lacuna, a ditch, lake, < lacus, lake; (2) It. lagone, a pool, aug. of lago, a lake, < L. lacus, a lake: see lacuna, lake[1].] 1. An area of shallow water, or even of marshy land, bordering on the sea, and usually separated from the region of deeper water outside by a belt of sand or of sand-dunes, more or less changeable in position. The most famous lagoons are those near the head of the Adriatic, on its western side, on the outer edge of which is situated Venice, often called the "City of the Lagoons" (la città delle lagune). The tendency of the Brenta and other small streams coming from the Alps to fill up the Venetian lagoons is so powerful that it is only by persistent and costly works of hydraulic engineering that the city has to a certain extent retained its position unchanged. A somewhat similar condition prevails at the mouth of the Rhone, where, however, the lagoons are called étangs. On the southern coast of the Baltic considerable areas of the shallow sea (called Haffe) are closed in by long crescentiform sand-banks (Nehrungen); but the conditions here are quite different from those at the head of the Adriatic, since the streams flowing over the plains of North Germany are not torrential in character. Lagoons are found in great numbers along the coast of Brazil, formed there as elsewhere by the conflict of large detritus-bearing rivers with the ocean waves and tides. In regions where Spanish is or formerly was the current language, the word lagoon is likely to be used with more latitude of meaning, since in the Spanish language laguna is applied to ordinary lakes, to the bottoms of deep bays, especially when these are more or less closed in by a narrowing of the coast-lines, so as to give rise to lake-like areas, and also to shallow, swampy, or almost dried-up lakes inland as well as near the coast.

They went into a Lagune, or Lake of Salt-water [on the Mexican coast]. The mouth of this Lagune is not Pistol-shot wide. Dampier, Voyages, I. 241.

'Lagoons' nearly separated by sand bars from the ocean. Lyell, Elem. Geol., i. 4.

2. With reference to Tuscany and some other parts of Italy, the basin of a hot spring, especially one from which borax is obtained: from the Italian use of lagone in this sense.

The lagoons of Tuscany are basins into which the waters from Sofioni are discharged.
Geikie, Text-Book of Geol. (2d ed.), p. 218.

3. The area of still water inclosed within an atoll, which is often called a lagoon island.

We passed through the Low or Dangerous Archipelago, and saw several of those most curious rings of coral land, just rising above the water's edge, which have been called Lagoon Islands. Darwin, Voyage of the Beagle, xviii.

lagoon-whaling (la-gön'hwā″ling), n. The pursuit of or industry of killing the California gray whale in the lagoons. It is the most dangerous kind of gray-whaling.

lagophthalmia (lag-of-thal'mi-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. λαγώς, a hare, + ὀφθαλμός, the eye.] Inability to close the eye, resulting from paralysis, spasm, or local injury: so called from the supposition that in its natural condition the eye of the hare when asleep is affected with such inability. Also lagophthalmus.

lagophthalmic (lag-of-thal'mik), a. [< lagophthalmia + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with lagophthalmia.

lagophthalmus (lag-of-thal'mus), n. [NL.: see lagophthalmia.] Same as lagophthalmia.

lagopode (lag'ọ-pōd), n. [< lagopod-ous.] A ptarmigan; a snow-grouse. See Lagopus.

lagopodous (lā-gop'ọ-dus), a. [< Gr. λαγώπους (-ποδ-), hare-footed. see Lagopus.] In zoöl., hare-footed; having the feet densely furry or feathery, as a lemming or a ptarmigan. See first cut under grouse.

Lagopus (lā-gō'pus), n. [NL., < L. lagopus, < Gr. λαγώπους, a bird, prob. a kind of grouse, also a plant, hare's-foot; lit. 'hare-footed,' < λαγώς, a hare, + πούς = E. foot.] 1. A genus of grouse, of the family Tetraonidæ, having the feet and nasal fossæ densely feathered; the ptarmigans. There are several species, most of which turn white in winter. They inhabit alpine and boreal regions of the northern hemisphere. The red-game of Scotland is a peculiar insulated form which does not turn white in winter, known as L. scoticus. The willow-grouse is L. albus. The rock-ptarmigan is L. rupestris. The white-tailed ptarmigan of the Rocky Mountains is L. leucurus. There are other species. See first cut under grouse.

2. A former generic name of the plant hare's-foot, Ochroma Lagopus.

Lagorchestes (lag-ôr-kes'tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. λαγώς, a hare, + ὀρχηστής, a dancer: see orchestra.] A genus of Australian marsupial mammals of the family Macropodidæ, having the muffle hairy as in Macropus; the hare-kangaroos. They are small, somewhat resembling hares, and live in open plains, making a form in the herbage. L. hirsutus is an example. See cut under hare-kangaroo.

lagostoma (lā-gos'tọ-mä), n. [NL., < Gr. λαγός, a hare, + στόμα, the mouth.] In teratol., harelip.

Lagostomidæ (lag-os-tom'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lagostomus + -idæ.] A supposed family of rodents, typified by the genus Lagostomus. Also Lagostominæ, as a subfamily of Chinchillidæ.

Lagostomus (lā-gos'tọ-mus), n. [NL., < Gr. λαγός, a hare, + στόμα, the mouth.] A South American genus of hystricomorphic rodents of the family Chinchillidæ, of comparatively large size and stout form, with the lip cleft, the fore feet 4-toed, the hind 3-toed, and bushy tail. The only species is the viscacha or biscacha, L. trichodactylus. Also erroneously Lagostomys. See cut under viscacha.

Lagothrix (lā-goth'riks), n. [NL., < Gr. λαγώς, a hare, + θρίξ, the hair.] 1. A genus of South American monkeys, of the family Cebidæ and subfamily Cebinæ; the woolly monkeys. They have a long prehensile tail, which is naked on the under side near the end, well-developed thumbs, comparatively short limbs, and woolly dark pelage. The commonest are L. humboldti, the caparra or caparre, and L. infumatus, the barrigudo. The latter is one of the largest of American monkeys, the body being upward of two feet in length. See cut on following page.

2. [l. c.] A monkey of this genus.

lagotic (lā-gō'tik), a. [< Gr. λαγώς, a hare, + οὖς (ὠτ-), = E. ear[1], + -ic.] Rabbit-eared.

Woolly Monkey (Lagothrix humboldti).

Lagotis (lā-gō′tis), n. [< Gr. λαγώς, a hare, + οὖς (ὠτ-) = E. ear[1].] A synonym of Lagidium. Bennett, 1833.

Lagrange's equation. See equation.

Lagrangian (la-gran′ji-an), a. [< Lagrange (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to Joseph Louis Lagrange (1736–1813), a great Piedmontese mathematician, who brought analytical mechanics to a regular method.—Lagrangian determinant, a determinant which is equated to zero in Lagrange's method of treating small oscillations.—Lagrangian equation. See equation.—Lagrangian formula of interpolation, the formula

$$U_x = U_a \frac{(x-b)\,(x-c)\,\ldots}{(a-b)\,(a-c)\,\ldots} + U_b \frac{(x-a)\,(x-c)\,\ldots}{(b-a)\,(b-c)\,\ldots} + \text{etc.}$$

This formula really belongs to Euler.—Lagrangian function. See function.—Lagrangian method, in hydrodynamics, the method which uses the differential equation of the motion of a particle, instead of that of the velocity at a point in space. This method was used by Lagrange, but originated with Euler, like the so-called Eulerian method.

lagre (F. pron. lä′gr), n. [F.] In sheet-glass manuf., a sheet of glass laid over the flattening-stone to protect a cylinder to be flattened from any slight inequalities of the stone itself.

lagrimando (lag-ri-man′dō), a. [It., ppr. of lagrimare, weep, < L. lacrimare, weep: see lacrymation.] Same as lagrimoso.

lagrimoso (lag-ri-mō′sō), a. [It.: see lacrimoso.] In music, plaintive: noting passages to be so rendered. Also lacrimoso and lagrimando.

lag-screw (lag′skrö), n. 1. A flat-headed screw, used principally to attach lags to band-drums. —2. An iron bolt with a square or hexagonal head and cut with a wood-screw thread. It is cylindrical under the bead, so as to admit of turning after it has entered the wood. In Great Britain called coach-screw. Car-Builder's Dict.

Lagthing (läg′ting), n. [Norw., < lag, law, + thing, parliament: see law[1] and thing.] The upper house of the Norwegian Storthing or parliament, consisting of one fourth of the members of the latter elected by the whole body. See Storthing.

lag-tooth†, n. One of the grinders, the hindmost molar or wisdom-tooth: so called because it is the last to be cut. Florio.

laguncula (lā-gung′kū-lä), n. [L., a dim. of lagona, lagena, a flagon: see lagena.] Same as lagena.

Laguncularia (lā-gung-kū-lā′ri-ä), n. [NL. (Gärtner, 1805), < L. laguncula, dim. of lagena, a bottle, in allusion to the form of the calyx.] A genus of dicotyledonous choripetalous plants belonging to the family Combretaceæ and tribe Combreteæ, having the calyx-tube turbinate and not produced beyond the ovary, 10 included stamens, opposite leaves, and spiked flowers. Only one species is known, L. racemosa, the white buttonwood or white mangrove, a native of the immediate coast throughout the West Indies, semitropical Florida, tropical America, and also of tropical Africa. It is a small tree, usually only 20 or 30 feet in height, but in exceptional cases 60 or 70, with very heavy, hard, and strong close-grained wood, susceptible of a high polish.

lagune, n. See lagoon.

lahman†, n. See lagaman.

Lahore cloth. [So called from Lahore in India.] A name given to cloth made in Great Britain from Cashmere wool.

laic (lā′ik), a. and n. [The older form is lay[4], q. v.; laic is directly from the LL.; = F. laïque = Sp. laico, lego = Pg. leigo = It. laico, < LL. laïcus, < Gr. λαϊκός, of or from the people, < λαός, the people.] I. a. Belonging to the laity or people, in distinction from the clergy or professionals.

An unprincipled, unedified, and laick rabble.
Milton, Areopagitica, p. 35.

II. n. A layman, in distinction from a clergyman.

The privilege of teaching was anciently permitted to many worthy Laymen; And Cyprian in his Epistles professes he will doe nothing without the advice and assent of his assistant Laicks. Milton, Church-Government, ii. 3.

laical (lā′i-kal), a. [< laic + -al.] Same as laic. [Rare.]

laicality (lā-i-kal′i-ti), n. [< laic + -ality.] The condition or quality of being laic; the state of a layman. [Rare.]

laically (lā′i-kal-i), adv. After the manner of a layman or the laity.

laicization (lā′i-si-zā′shon), n. [< laicize + -ation.] The act of rendering lay, or of depriving of a clerical character; removal from clerical rank, influence, or control.

In France, the republic seemed bent on an entire division of church and state, and the laicization of the hospitals and schools still continued.
Appleton's Ann. Cyc., 1886, p. 790.

laicize (lā′i-sīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. laicized, ppr. laicizing. [< laic + -ize.] To render lay; deprive of a clerical character or relation.

So it is M. Lavy, M. Joffrin, M. Navarre, M. Patenne, who guide the spirit of education, and choose the books for our libraries. You may be sure that they take care that laicising should become a reality.
Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XLIII. 710.

★ laid (lād), p. a. [Pp. of lay[1], v.] 1. Put or set down; thrown down; prostrate.

Such pleasaunce makes the Grashopper so poore,
And ligge so layd, when Winter doth her straine.
Spenser, Shep. Cal., October.

They that have drunk "the cup of slumber" had need to be bidden "awake and stand up," for they are sluggish and laid. Rev. T. Adams, Works, I. 169.

2. Pressed down; pressed.—Laid paper, paper that shows in its fabric the marks of the close parallel wires on which the paper-pulp was laid in the process of its manufacture: distinguished from wove paper, which in the process of manufacture is laid on woven flannels or on felts.

laidly (lād′li), a. A dialectal variant of loathly.

laie[1]†, v. An obsolete form of lay[1].

laie[2]†. An obsolete preterit of lie[1].

laie[3]†, n. An obsolete form of lay[3].

laier†, n. An obsolete form of lair[1], layer.

laigh (lāċh), a. A dialectal (Scotch) form of low[2].

laik, v. and n. See lake[2].

lain[1] (lān). Past participle of lie[1].

lain[2] (lān), n. [Cf. lain[1], pp.; < lay[1], v. Cf. lair[1], layer.] 1†. A layer. Harrison, Descrip. of England, p. 187. (Halliwell.)—2. Plow-land lying at the foot of the downs. [Prov. Eng.]

Light falls the rain on link and laine.
Spectator, No. 2137, p. 574.

lain[3]† (lān), n. [< ME. lain, layn, layen, layne, denial, concealment; partly < AS. lygen = OS. lugina = D. logen = MLG. logene, loggene, logge = OHG. lugina, MHG. lügene, lügen, G. lüge = Dan. Sw. lögn = Goth. liugn, falsehood, and partly from a related noun represented by OHG. lougna, denial, = Icel. laun = Sw. Dan. lön, concealment (whence the verb lain[3], q. v.); from the root of AS. leógan, etc., lie: see lie[2].] Denial; concealment.

A woman I sawe there at the last
That I first met, with-outyn layn, Ful doofully on me here eyn sche cast.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 210.

Sir Gawayne and the Green Knight (E. E. T. S.), l. 1786.

II. intrans. To use concealment; speak falsely.

"Of my dissese," quod she, "yf I shuld layne
Only to yow, I wis I were to blame."
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 717.

lainer†, laineré†, n. Same as lannier.

lair[1] (lār), n. [Also in some senses layer, which is partly differentiated; < ME. leir, < AS. leger, a couch, bed, lair (= D. leger, a couch, bed, lair, = OHG. legar, a couch, MHG. leger, lägar, læger, G. lager, a couch, bed, place of lying, storehouse (see lager-beer), = Goth. ligrs, a couch), < licgan, lie: see lie[1]. Cf. layer, leaguer[2].] 1. A place in which to lie or rest; a bed; a couch: now used only of, or with figurative reference to, the den or resting-place of a wild beast.

My love I lulled vppe in hys leir,
With cradel-bande I gan hym bynde, Cros, he stiketh vppon thi steir,
Naked in the wylde wynde.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 200.

Out of the ground up rose,
As from his lair, the wild beast.
Milton, P. L., vii. 457.

2†. A litter, as of rabbits; a stock.

His bride and hee were both rabbets of one laier.
Breton, Merry Wonders, p. 8.

3†. An open pasture; a field.

More hard for hungry steed t' abstaine from pleasant lare.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. viii. 29.

4. A portion of a burying-ground affording space sufficient for one or more graves; a burial-plot. [Scotch.]—5. A place or shed for cattle to rest in.

Cattle lairs . . . separate slaughtering-room, with lairs for animals suffering from, or suspected to be suffering from, contagious disease. Encyc. Brit., XXXII. 645.

lair[2] (lār), n. A Scotch form of lore[1].

lair[3] (lār), n. [< ME. laire, layre, lare, < Icel. leir = Sw. Dan. ler, clay, mire.] 1†. Clay; earth.

Of water his body, is flesshe laire,
His heer of fuyr, his honde of ayre.
Cursor Mundi. (Halliwell.)

2. Mire; a bog; a quagmire. [Scotch.]—3. Soil; land; ground: in this sense probably confused with lair[1], 3. [Provincial.]

lair[3] (lār), v. i. [< lair[3], n.] To sink when wading in snow, mud, or quagmire. [Scotch.]

And thro' the drift, deep lairing, sprattle.
Burns, A Winter Night.

lairage (lār′āj), n. Space where cattle may lie down and rest. N. E. D.

laird (lārd), n. [The Sc. form of lord.] In Scotland, a landed proprietor; especially, the owner of a hereditary estate; also, rarely, a house-owner; a landlord.

lairdship (lārd′ship), n. [< laird + -ship; ult. a dial. form of lordship.] 1. The condition or quality of a laird.—2. An estate; landed property. [Scotch.]

My lairdship can yield me
As meikle a year
As had us in pottage
And gude knockit beer.
Ramsay, Poems, II. 313.

lairy (lār′i), a. [< ME. layry, layri, layery; < lair[3] + -y[1].] 1. Miry. [Scotch.]—2†. Earthly.

For it es heghe, and alle that it duellis in it lyftes abowne layery lustes, and vile covaytes.
MS. Lincoln A. i. 17, f. 196. (Halliwell.) laisser-faire (les′ā-fār′), n. [F.: laisser = It. lasciare, let, permit, < L. laxare, relax; faire, < L. facere, do: see fact.] A letting alone; a general non-interference with individual freedom of action; the let-alone principle or policy in government and political economy. The term was first used in France to designate that principle of political economy which would leave industry and trade absolutely free from taxation or restriction by government, except so far as required by public peace and order. It has since been extended to include non-interference by controlling authority with any guiltless exercise of individual will.

laissez-faire (les′ā-fār′), n. [F.: laissez, 2d pers. pl. impv. of laisser, let; faire, do: see laisser-faire.] Same as laisser-faire.

Nowadays, however, the worst punishment to be looked for by one who questions its [governmental authority's] omnipotence, is that he will be reviled as a reactionary who talks laissez-faire. H. Spencer, Man vs. State, p. 55.

laistowe†, n. Same as laystall.

lait[1]†, n. [ME. lait, layt, leit, leyt, < AS. līget, lēget, pl. līgetu, ligeta, lēgetu, lightning; cf. OHG. laugazan = Goth. lauhatjan, lighten; from the root of leóht, light: see light[1], a. and n.] Lightning; flash.

And that ys not full moche wonder,
For that day cometh layte and thonder.
MS. Cantab. Ff. ii. 38, f. 43. (Halliwell.)

lait[2] (lāt), v. t. and i. [Also late; < ME. laiten, layten, lezten, < Icel. leita, seek, search, inquire, = AS. wlātian, look at, = Goth. wlaitōn, look around.] To seek; search for; inquire. [Prov. Eng.]

laithly (lāth′li), a. A dialectal (Scotch) form of loathly.

laits (lāts), n. Same as laithe.

laity (lā′i-ti), n. [< lay[4] + -ty (cf. gaiety, < gay[1]).] 1†. The state of being a layman, or of not being in orders.

The more usual cause of this deprivation is a mere laity, or want of holy orders. Ayliffe, Parergon.

2. The people, as distinguished from the clergy; the body of the people not in orders; laymen collectively.

If personal defailance be thought reasonable to disemploy the whole calling, then neither clergy nor laity should ever serve a prince. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 245.

3. The people outside of a particular profession, as distinguished from those belonging to it; persons unskilled in a particular art or science, as distinguished from those who are professionally conversant with it.

What . . . could be more absurd than for one of the laity to attempt to measure and weigh stars many millions of millions of miles removed from his grasp?
G. H. Lewes, Probs. of Life and Mind, Int., I. i. § 20.

lak†, n. and v. A Middle English form of lack[1].

lake[1] (lāk), n. [< ME. lak, lake, a stream (< ★AS. lacu, a stream), merged with ME. lake, lak, < AF. lake, lak, OF. lac, F. lac = Sp. Pg. It. lago, < L. lacus, a large body of water, a basin, tank, or cistern of water, pit, hollow, = Gr. λάκκος, a hole, pit, pond; = Ir. Gael. loch (> AS. luh, E. lough, Sc. loch) = W. llwch = Corn. lo = Bret. louch, a lake (see loch and lough, which are thus ult. identical with lake). The AS. lagu, lago (> ME. laie, laye, etc.: see lay[9]), = OS. lagu (in comp.) = Icel. lögr, the sea, water. The AS. lagu = OHG. lagu = Icel. lögr = Goth. lagus, the name of the Runic form of the letter L, are distinct words.] 1. A stream; a rivulet. [Now prov. Eng.]—2. A body of water surrounded by land, or not forming part of the ocean and occupying a depression below the ordinary drainage-level of the region. Lakes occupy depressions or basins filled by streams flowing into them, the water thus introduced generally accumulating until it runs over at the lowest point of the edge of the depression, and then flowing to the sea. The larger lake basins owe their origin to movements of the earth's crust. Many smaller lakes, especially the shallower ones, originate from the irregular distribution of glacial drift. Glacial erosion has also produced many lakes, some of them of unusual depth. Some lakes occupy volcanic craters and calderas; others are barred by lava flows. The existence of a depression being given, the question whether it shall be entirely filled with water is one of climate. In regions of small rainfall and large evaporation, basins occur which do not become filled with water, and consequently do not furnish any surplus which shall overflow and run to the sea. Such regions, having no drainage to the sea, are called closed basins; there are very large areas of this character in Asia and North America, and smaller ones elsewhere. The water in the lakes occupying the lowest portion of such depressions is more or less saline, because that which is brought in leaves as it evaporates a constantly accumulating store of the saline matters which it holds in solution. The Caspian Sea is properly a salt lake; some lakes are excessively salt, as the Great Salt Lake in Utah and the Dead Sea (also properly a lake). There are lakes of considerable size, as several in Canada, which have no visible inlets, being fed entirely from springs.

Ye elves of hills, brooks, standing lakes, and groves;
And ye that on the sands with printless foot
Do chase the ebbing Neptune, and do fly him,
When he comes back. Shak., Tempest, v. 1. 33.

Never more
Shall the lake glass her, flying over it.
M. Arnold, Sohrab and Rustum, l. 108.

3. A relatively small pond partly or wholly artificial, as an ornament of a park or of public or private grounds.

At Timon's villa let us pass a day. . . .
Two Cupids squirt before; a lake behind Improves the keenness of the northern wind.
Pope, Moral Essays, iv. 111.

4†. A pit; den.

And set hym in ye lake of lyons where Danyell the prophete was, and refresshed hym with mete and drynke.
Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 35.

Thow salle lose this layke, and thi lyfe aftyre!
Thow has lyffede in delytte and lordchippes inewe!
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3387.

lake[3] (lāk), n. [< F. laque, lac, < Pers. lāk, lake, < lak, lac: see lac[2].] A pigment formed by absorbing animal, vegetable, or coal-tar coloring matter from an aqueous solution by means of metallic bases. The general method of preparation is to add an alkali solution to an infusion of the substance affording the desired color, as madder, cochineal, logwood, or quercitron. To this is added a solution of common alum, producing a precipitate of alumina, which in settling carries with it the coloring matter, thus forming the lake. As paints, lakes lack body, and are mostly used in glazing over other colors. From cochineal is prepared carmine, the finest of the red lakes. Crimson lake is a cochineal lake containing more aluminous base than carmine. Carminated lake is the cheaper and weaker lake made from cochineal after the carmine has been extracted. Scarlet lake is prepared by mixing vermilion with crimson lake. Purple lake is a species of crimson lake with a purple hue. Madder lakes are produced by precipitating the coloring matter of the madder-root with an alumina base. They range in color from light pink through red to brown and purple. Indian lake is the same as lac-lake (which see, under lac[2]). Yellow lake is made from quercitron-bark, sometimes from Persian or French Avignon berries. Green lake is compounded by adding Prussian blue to yellow lake. Citrine lake is an obsolete term for brown pink. Burnt lake is obtained by partially charring crimson lake. From logwood are obtained lakes of various shades of deep-brownish red, as rose lake, Florence lake, Florentine lake, etc. From certain of the coal-tar colors are obtained lakes almost identical in color with cochineal and madder and equal in permanency.

lake[4]† (lāk), n. [ME., < OD. laken, D. laken, linen, cloth, a sheet, = OS. lacan = MLG. laken, cloth, = OHG. lakhan, lachan, MHG. lachen, G. laken = Icel. lakan = Dan. lagen = Sw. lakan, a sheet.] A kind of fine white linen.

lake-dweller (lāk′dwel″ėr), n. A lacustrian; an inhabitant of a lake-dwelling or lacustrine village.

lake-dwelling (lāk′dwel″ing), n. A dwelling built on piles or other support over the water of a lake or other body of water. The name was first applied to remains of prehistoric dwellings discovered in recent times at the bottom of many lakes of Switzerland, and is now used for similar structures anywhere, whether ancient or modern. In the Swiss lakes, as in most other examples, a number of dwellings, forming a lacustrine village, were built together on a platform resting either upon piles or upon layers of fascines supported by stakes, and appear generally to have been connected with the shore by a bridge. Many implements of bone, flint, lake-sturgeon (lāk′stėr″jon), n. The common fresh-water sturgeon of North America, Acipenser rubicundus. Also called black sturgeon, ★Ohio sturgeon, rock-sturgeon, and stone-sturgeon.

lake-trout (lāk′trout), n. 1. The common salmon-trout of western North America, Salmo clarki; the Rocky Mountain brook-trout; the Yellowstone trout. It is one of the river-salmon, not anadromous, and belongs to the section Fario of the genus Salmo. It has a narrow band of small teeth on the hyoid bone. The caudal fin is slightly forked; the dorsal rather low. It is extremely variable in size, coloration, and character of the scales. It may be generally recognized by the profusion of small round black spots on most of the body, and a red blotch on the lower jaw. It is regarded as the parent stock of several varieties of black-spotted trout. It abounds in the rivers of Alaska, Oregon, and Washington, there descending to the sea, and sometimes attains a weight of 20 pounds; it is also found in the Yellowstone and upper Missouri regions, the Great Basin of Utah, in Colorado, and in the upper Rio Grande. The Waha lake-trout of Washington is a variety (bouvieri) of this species. Another variety, found from the Kansas to the upper Missouri, is called var. stomias. A third is var. henshawi, the silver or black trout of Lake Tahoe, Pyramid Lake, and the streams of the Sierra Nevada. The variations of this fish have given rise to many technical names. See cut under salmon-trout.

2. The Mackinaw trout, Cristivomer namaycush, more fully called the Great Lake trout; the longe of Vermont; the togue of Maine. This is an entirely different fish from the foregoing, being near a char.

Great Lake trout, or Mackinaw Trout (Cristivomer namaycush).

The mouth is large, with very strong teeth; the caudal fin is well forked, the adipose small; the color is dark gray, sometimes pale, sometimes blackish, everywhere marked with rounded paler spots, often tinged with reddish. This fish sometimes attains a length of 3 feet; it abounds in the larger bodies of water of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, northern New York, and the Great Lake region, to Montana and northward to the Yukon. A variety found only in Lake Superior is the siscowet.

lakewake†, n. Same as likewake. Bourne's Pop. Antiq. (1777), p. 21.

lamb (lam), n. [< ME. lamb, lomb, pl. lamben, lambren, lambron, < AS. lamb, lomb (ONorth. also lemb), also lombor (pl. lambru, lombru, lomberu, lomboro) = OS. lamb = D. MLG. lam = OHG. lamb, MHG. lamb, lamp, lam, G. lamm = Icel. lamb = Sw. lamm = Dan. lam = Goth. lamb, a lamb.] 1. A young animal of the sheep kind; a young sheep.

And men fynden with inne a lytylle Best, in Flessche, in Bon and Blode, as though it were a lytylle Lomb, with outen Wolle. Mandeville, Travels, p. 264.

And in the fields all round I hear the bleating of the lamb.
Tennyson, May Queen, Conclusion.

2. A person gentle or innocent as a lamb.

Outward lambren semen we,
Fulle of goodnesse and of pitee;
And inward we, withouten fable,
Ben gredy wolves ravysable.
Rom. of the Rose, l. 7013.

The very whitest lamb in all my fold Loves you: I know her: the worst thought she has
Is whiter even than her pretty hand.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

Hence—3. One easily beguiled or fleeced; an inexperienced speculator who is deceived into making losing investments. [Slang.]

When a young gentleman or apprentice comes into this school of virtue unskilled in the quibbles and devices there practised, they call him a lamb; then a rook (who is properly the wolf) follows him close and . . . gets all his money, and then they smile and say "The lamb is bitten."
The Nicker Nicked, 1669 (Harl. Misc., II. 109).

4. Ironically, a ruffian or bully: as, Kirke's lambs (a troop of British soldiers noted for their atrocities in suppressing Monmouth's rebellion in 1685).—Holy lamb, in the Gr. Ch., a square projection rising above the rest of the round, flat oblate of leavened bread. It is stamped with a cross, in the angles of which are the letters IC XC NI KA—that is, Ἰησοῦς Χριστὸς νικᾷ, "Jesus Christ conquers." The priest divides the holy lamb from the remainder of the oblate with the holy lance in the office of prothesis, and it is the part afterward used for consecration, the antidoron being taken from the remainder. Also called the holy loaf or the holy bread and the seal.—The Lamb, the Lamb of God, the Christ, as typified by the paschal lamb.

Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world. John i. 29.

★ lamb (lam), v. i. [< lamb, n.] To bring forth young, as sheep.

They [the sheep] lamb not so soon as with us, for at the end of May their lambs are not come in season.
Brand, Zetland, p. 75.

lambackt, v. t. [Also lambeak; appar. < lam[1] + obj. back[1]. Cf. lambaste.] To beat; cudgel. [Old slang.]

Happy may they call that daie whereon they are not lambeaked before night. Discov. of New World, p. 115.

lambackt, n. [Also lambeak: see the verb.] A beating; a cudgeling; a blow.

With that five or six wives started up and fell upon the colliar, and gave unto him halfe a score of sound lambeakes with their cudgels. Greene, Discovery of Coosnage (1591).

lamb-ale (lam′ āl), n. A country feast at lamb-shearing.

Lamb-ale is still [1781] used at the village of Kirtlington in Oxfordshire for an annual feast or celebrity at lamb-shearing. T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III. 129.

lamballe (lam-bal′), n. [So called after the Princess de Lamballe.] A fichu or scarf of surah or foulard, usually trimmed with lace: a fashion of about 1878.

lambaste (lam-bāst′), v. t.; pret. and pp. lambasted, ppr. lambasting. [Appar. < lam[1] + baste[1].] To beat severely; thrash; in sailors' use, to beat with a rope's end. [Slang.]

Whine not, my love: his fury streight will waste him;
Stand off awhile, and see how He lambaste him.
Britannia Triumphans (1637). (Nares.)

lambativet (lam′ba-tiv), a. and n. [More correctly lambitive;* < L. lambitus, pp. of lambere, lick, lap: see lambent.] I. a. That may be licked up; to be taken by licking.

In affections both of lungs and weason, physicians make use of syrups and lambative medicines. Sir T. Browne.

Upon the mantle-tree . . . stood a pot of lambative electuary. Steele, Tatler, No. 266.

★ II. n. A medicine taken by licking.

lambda (lam′dä), n. [< Gr. λάμβδα, < Heb. lāmedh.] 1. The name of the Greek letter Λ, λ (equivalent to the Roman L, l).—2. In craniol., the junction of the sagittal and lambdoid sutures at the apex of the latter. See cut under craniometry.

lambdacism (lam′da-sizm), n. [< LL. lambdacismus, labdacismus, < Gr. λαμβδακισμός, λαβδακισμός, a fault in pronunciation of the letter l, < λαμβδακίζειν, pronounce l faultily, < λάμβδα, the letter l: see lambda.] 1. A too frequent use of words containing the letter l in speaking or writing. A Latin example appears in the following:

Sol et *l*una *l*uce *l*ucent *a*lba, *l*eni, *l*actea.
Martianus Capella.

2. An imperfect pronunciation of the letter r, making it sound like l; lallation. The defect is common among children, and also among the Chinese in speaking foreign languages, from the absence of the sound of r as an initial in their native tongue.

lambdaic (lam′dā-ik), n. [< Gr. λάμβδα, the letter Λ, λ (see lambda), + -ic.] In math., the result of subtracting the same indeterminate quantity, λ, from all the elements of the principal diagonal of a determinant, or of subtracting λ with numerical submultiples and alternating signs from the sinister diagonal. See latent root, under latent.

lambdoid (lam′doid), a. [< Gr. λαμβδοειδής, formed like a lambda (Λ), < λάμβδα, the letter Λ, + εἶδος, shape.] Having the shape of the Greek capital lambda (Λ): specifically applied in anatomy to the suture between the supraoccipital and the two parietal bones of the skull, which has this form in man. See cut under cranium.

lambdoidal (lam-doi′dal), a. [< lambdoid + -al.] Same as lambdoid.

lambeakt, v. and n. See lamback.

lambeau (lam′bō), n.; pl. lambeaux (-bōz). [F.: see label.] In her., one of the points or drops in a label.—Cross lambeaux. See cross[1].

lambeauxed (lam′bōd), a. In her., same as dovetailed.

lambeck (lam′bek), n. [Lambeck, Lembecq, in Belgium.] A beer made in Belgium by the process called the self-fermentation of worts.

lambel (lam′bel), n. [OF., a tag, label: see label.] 1. A part of the housings of a horse, having the form of a rectangular tablet or screen hanging at the breast or flank, evidently intended for defense, and probably of cuir-bouilli, or of gamboised work. J. Hewitt.—2†. pl. Same as lamboys, 2.—3. In her., same as label.

lambency (lam′ben-si), n.; pl. lambencies (-siz). [< lamben(t) + -cy.] The quality of being lambent; that which is lambent; a lambent gleam.

These were sacred lambencies, tongues of authentic flame from heaven. Carlyle, Reminiscences.

lambent (lam′bent), a. [< L. lamben(t-)s, ppr. of lambere, lick; cf. Gr. λάπτειν, lap: see lap[1].] 1. Licking. [Rare.]

To stroke his azure neck, or to receive
The lambent homage of his arrowy tongue.
Cowper, Task, vi. 782.

Hence—2. Running along or over a surface, as if in the act of licking; flowing over or along; lapping or bathing; softly bright; gleaming.

The Star that did my Being frame
Was but a lambent Flame.
Cowley, Pindaric Odes, vi. 4.

★ Those [eyes] only are beautiful which, like the planets, have a steady, lambent light—are luminous, but not sparkling. Longfellow, Hyperion, iii. 4.

Lambeth Articles. See article.

lambict, n. A Middle English form of limbec. Chaucer.

lambie (lam′i), n. [Dim. of lamb.] A little lamb; a lambkin. Also lammie. [Scotch.]

When linnets sang, and lambies play'd.
Burns, As on the Banks.

lambish†, a. [< ME. lambyssh; < lamb + -ish[1].] Lamblike.

The lambyssh poeple, voyded of al vyse,
Hadden no fantasye to debate.
Chaucer, Former Age, l. 50.

lambkill (lam′kil), n. [< lamb + kill[1].] The sheep-laurel, Kalmia angustifolia.

lambkin (lam′kin), n. [= D. and Flem. lammeken; as lamb + -kin.] 1. A little lamb.

In the warm folds their tender lambkins lie.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xiii.

2. One treated as gently as a lamb; one fondly cherished.

Sir John, thy tender lambkin now is king;
Harry the Fifth's the man.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., v. 3. 122.

lamblike (lam′līk), a. [< lamb + like[2].] Like a lamb; gentle; humble; meek: as, a lamblike temper.

lambling (lam′ling), n. [< lamb + -ling[1].] A young or small lamb; hence, a stupidly or ignorantly innocent person.

It was over the black sheep [negroes] of the Castlewood flock that Mr. Ward somehow had the most influence. These woolly lamblings were immensely affected by his exhortations. Thackeray, Virginians, v.

lamboys†, n. pl. [< OF. lambeau, a shred, flap, etc.: see label.] 1. A skirt of tassets of the form worn in the sixteenth century. Compare tasset.—2. In the armor of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the base or skirt of ornamental stuff. Meyrick. Also lambels.

lambren†, n. An obsolete plural of lamb.

lambrequin (lam′bre-kin), n. [< F. lambrequin, the covering or trappings of a helmet, a mantle, scallop; of D. origin.] 1. A piece of textile fabric, leather, or the like, hanging by one of its edges, and typically having the opposite edge dagged, slitted, scalloped, or otherwise cut in an ornamental manner: used in several ways. (a) In medieval armor, a piece of stuff worn over the helmet of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, especially at tourneys and justs. This usage is figured in modern heraldry. See below. (b) In upholstery, a sort of curtain covering the upper part of an opening, as a door or window, and often forming a kind of cornice to the curtain proper. (c) A short curtain or a piece of drapery suspended for ornament from a mantel-shelf or the like.

2. In decorative art, painting on a surface more or less imitating or resembling a lambrequin, as in some Chinese vases, in which the upper part of the body is covered by solid decoration having a lower edge of jagged or ornamented outline.—3. In her., the mantelet, represented as floating from the helmet, and often forming an important part of the ornamental decoration of the achievement.

lambskin (lam′skin), n. 1. The furred or woolly skin of a lamb, either of natural color or dyed, prepared for use in dress or in the ornamenting of costume, for mats, etc.; also, collectively, material so prepared from lambs' skins. The finest lambskins are the Persian, which are either gray or black, and rank among costly furs. Hungarian and Spanish lambskins are used especially in the national costume for men, a jacket or short coat being made wholly of this material. Prussian lambskins are used for coat-cuffs and coat-collars. One of the best-known varieties is astrakhan.

A furred gown to keep him warm: and furred with fox and lamb-skins too. Shak., M. for M., iii. 2. 9.

2. The skin of a lamb, or collectively the skins of lambs, freed from wool and dressed for making gloves, etc.—3. Woolen cloth made to resemble lambskin.—4. Anthracite coal of inferior quality (culm). [Swansea, Wales.]

lambskin (lam′skin), v. t.; pret. and pp. lambskinned, ppr. lambskinning. [< lambskin, n.; not quite like the equiv. cowhide, v., but a humorous use, alluding to lam[1], v.] To beat.

What think you of our countryman Hercules, that for love put on Amphale's apron and sat spinning amongst her wenches, while his mistress wore his lion's skin, and lamb-skinned him if he did not his business?
Chapman, Widow's Tears, ii. 4.

lamb's-lettuce (lamz′let″is), n. Same as corn-salad.

lamb's-quarters (lamz′kwâr″tėrz), n. 1. A European weed, Atriplex patula, family Chenopodiaceæ.—2. An American weed of the same family, Chenopodium album, naturalized from Europe; white goosefoot.

lamb's-tongue (lamz′tung), n. 1. The hoary plantain, Plantago media. See plantain.—2. A carpenters' plane having a deep and narrow bit, used for making quirks. E. H. Knight.

lamb's-wool (lamz′wůl), n. 1. The wool of lambs, used in manufacture; hence, delicate wool, as of certain breeds of sheep or of lambs, or of mixed varieties, used for the manufacture of hosiery.—2. [Prob. so called from its softness; cf. velvet, applied to fine old spirit; yard of flannel, a kind of flip.] Ale mixed with sugar, nutmeg, and the pulp of roasted apples.

A cupp of lambs-wool they dranke unto him then.
King and Miller of Mansfield (Child's Ballads, VIII. 37).

Next crowne the bowle full
With gentle lambs-wooll, Adde sugar, and nutmeg, and ginger.
Herrick, Twelfe Night.

Being come home, we to cards, till two in the morning, and drinking lamb's-wool. Pepys, Diary, III. 7.

Lamb's-wool yarn, a soft woolen yarn, slightly twisted, used for fancy work. Dict. of Needlework.

lame[1] (lām), a. [< ME. lame, < AS. lama = OS. lam = OFries. lom, lam = D. lam = MLG. lam, OHG. MHG. lam, G. lahm = Icel. lami = Sw. Dan. lam, lame; perhaps orig. 'bruised, maimed': cf. lam[1], v.] 1. Crippled or disabled by injury to or defect of a limb or limbs; specifically, walking with difficulty; halting; limping: as, a lame man or horse.

I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame.
Job xxix. 15.

2. Inefficient from injury or defect; unsound or impaired in strength; crippled: as, a lame leg or arm.

The golde hath made his wittes lame.
Gower, Conf. Amant., v.

Myself would work eye dim, and finger lame.
Tennyson, Geraint.

3. Figuratively, imperfect; lacking finish or completeness; defective in quality or quantity; halting; insufficient; hobbling: as, lame verse; lame rimes; a lame excuse.

O most lame and impotent conclusion!
Shak., Othello, ii. 1. 162.

The sick man's sacrifice is but a lame oblation.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Mor., i. 4.

Santa Croce and the dome of St. Peter's are lame copies after a divine model. Emerson, History.

Lame duck, in commercial slang, one who is unable to meet his obligations; a bankrupt; especially, a defaulter on the stock-exchange.

I may be lame but I shall never be a duck, nor deal in the garbage of the alley. Walpole, Letters (1771), III. 337.

lame[1] (lām), v. t.; pret. and pp. lamed, ppr. laming. [< ME. lamen, < AS. lemian (= OS. lamōn (in comp. bi-lamōn) = OFries. lema, lama = D. ver-lammen = MLG. lamen, lemen = OHG. lamēn, lemjan, MHG. lamen, lemen, G. lähmen = Icel. lemja, thrash, flog, beat, lame, disable, = Dan. lamme = Sw. lamma), < lama, lame: see lame[1], a. Cf. lam[1], v.] To make lame; cripple or disable; render imperfect or unsound: as, to lame an antagonist; to lame an arm or a leg.

I cannot help it now;
Unless, by using means, I lame the foot
Of our design. Shak., Cor., iv. 7. 7.

A tender foot will be galled and lamed, if you set it going in rugged paths. Barrow, Works, III. iii.

A spear,
Down-glancing, lamed the charger.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

lame[2] (lām), n. and a. [Also layme; an old or dial. form of loam.] I. n. 1. Earthenware. [Now Scotch.]

2 flagons of layme, enamelled with blue and white and one all blue. Inventory (1578).

2. A broken piece of earthenware; a potsherd. [Scotch.]

II. a. Earthen: used of pottery: as, a lame pig (an earthen vessel). [Scotch.]

lame[3]†, n. [Early mod. E. also lamm; < ME. lampe for lame*, < OF. (and F.) lame, a plate, a blade, < L. lamina, a thin plate: see lamina, and cf. lama[3].] In armor, a plate of metal. Florio.

He strake Phalantus just upon the gorget, so as he battered the lamms thereof. Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, iii.

lamel (lam′el), n. Same as lamella.

lamella (lā-mel′ą), n.; pl. lamellæ (-ē). [L., a small plate of metal, < lamina, a thin piece of metal, wood, etc.: see lamina.] A thin plate or scale. Specifically—(a) In bot.: (1) An erect scale or blade inserted at the junction of the claw and limb in some corollas, and forming a part of their corona or crown. (2) In the Agaricaceæ of hymenomycetous fungi, one of the radiating vertical plates on the under side of the pileus, upon which the hymenium is extended; one of the gills, for example, of common mushrooms (Agaricus). (b) In anat. and zoöl., a thin or small lamina; a plate or layer; especially, one of a series of thin plates arranged like the leaves of a book or the gills of an oyster.—Branchial lamella. See branchial.—Haversian lamellæ, hollow cylinders of bone-tissue surrounding and concentric with a Haversian canal. There are generally several to each canal, successively inclosed, as the successive rings of growth of an exogenous plant surround the central pith.—Horizontal lamella of the ethmoid, the cribriform plate, a part of the ethmoturbinal bone.—Lamellæ of bone, layers of bone-tissue concentrically arranged around a Haversian canal; Haversian lamellæ.—Perpendicular lamella of the ethmoid, the mesethmoid bone.=Syn. ★See lamina.

lamellar (lam′e-lär), a. [< lamella + -ar[3].] 1. Disposed in lamellæ or layers; laminar in a small way.

A magnet is said to be lamellar when it may be divided into simple closed magnetic shells or into open shells with their edges on the surface of the magnet.
Atkinson, tr. of Mascart and Joubert, I. 316.

2. Having a lamella or lamellæ; lamellate.—3. Formed of lamellæ; strengthened or covered with lamellæ: as, a lamellar skirt (a name given to the great braguette).—4. In bot., consisting of thin plates or lamellæ; lamelliform. See lamella (a).

lamellarly (lam′e-lär-li), adv. In the form of or by means of lamellæ: as, the leaves of a book lie lamellarly.

lamellar-stellate (lam′e-lär-stel′āt), a. In mineral., formed of thin plates or lamellæ arranged in star-shaped groups: as, gypsum has often a lamellar-stellate structure.

lamellate (lam′e-lāt), a. [< NL. lamellatus, < L. lamella, a thin metal plate: see lamella.] 1. Formed of a lamella, or disposed in lamellæ; lamellar in structure or arrangement.—2. Having lamellæ; furnished with little laminæ.—Lamellate antennæ, antennæ in which the outer joints are prolonged internally, opposing flat surfaces to each other, which may be brought into close contact, thus forming a transverse or, rarely, a rounded club supported on one side by the stem or funiculus of the antenna, as in the Scarabæidæ or cockchafers. Beetles having antennæ of this form are called lamellicorns. See cut under antenna.—Lamellate palpi, those palpi in which the terminal joint is divided longitudinally or transversely into several lamellæ or leaves.

lamellated (lam′e-lā-ted), a. Same as lamellate.

The lamellated antennæ of some, the clavellated of others, are surprisingly beautiful, when viewed through a microscope. Derham, Physico-Theology, viii. 4, note 3.

lamellibranch (lā-mel′i-brangk), a. and n. [< L. lamella, a plate, + branchiæ, gills.] I. a. Having lamellate gills; pertaining to the Lamellibranchiata, or having their characters.

II. n. One of the Lamellibranchiata, as any ordinary bivalve mollusk.

Also lamellibranchiate.

Lamellibranchia (lā-mel-i-brang′ki-ą), n. pl. Same as Lamellibranchiata.

Lamellibranchiata (lā-mel-i-brang-ki-ā′tą), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl.: see lamellibranchiate.] A group of mollusks without distinct head or cephalic eyes, with the branchiæ on each side of the body and generally expanded in a plate-like or lamelliform manner, and with a shell of two lateral valves completely or partly inclosing the body. The valves of the shell are connected and close over the back of the animal by a hinge; they are also generally united by one or two muscles, called adductors, which penetrate the body-mass. Opening of the shell is effected by an elastic ligament in or about the hinge. The shell is secreted by a prolongation of the integument called the mantle or pallium, which laps round the body, its halves being either free or united so as to leave only three apertures for the inlet and outlet of water for respiration, and for the protrusion of a fleshy organ called the foot, when it is present. The muscular edge of the mantle leaves on each valve an impression called the pallial line. Respiration is generally effected by lamellated gills (whence the name), usually occupying a large part of the interior of the shell on each side. The mouth is a simple jawless fissure, furnished with one or two pairs of soft palpi, the food being conveyed to it by cilia on the gills. The heart has a single ventricle pierced by the intestine, and there are three double nerve-centers. The group was originally designated by the author of the name (De Blainville, 1814) as an order, but has generally been adopted as a class of Mollusca, containing all the true or ordinary bivalve mollusks, of Vertical Transverse Section of Anodonta through the heart.

AA, mantle-lobes; B, foot; c, rectum; h, i, inner and outer gills; f, ventricle of heart; g, auricles of heart; p, pericardium; o', vestibule of q', the organ of Bojanus.

Diagrammatic Section of Fresh-water Mussel (Anodonta), illustrating anatomy of Lamellibranchiata.

AA, mantle, its right lobe cut away; B, foot; C, branchial chamber of mantle-cavity; D, anal chamber; I, II, anterior and posterior adductor muscles; III, retractor muscle of foot; a, mouth; b, stomach; c, intestine, coils of which are supposed to be seen through the side walls of the mesosoma; d, rectum; e, anus; f, ventricle; g, auricle; h, gills, except i, right external gill, largely cut away and turned back; k, labial palpi; l, cerebroganglion; m, pedal ganglion; n, parietosplanchnic ganglia; o, aperture of organ of Bojanus; p, pericardium.

which oysters, clams, etc., are familiar examples. Synonyms of the whole group are Acephala, Bivalvia, Conchifera, Cormopoda, and Pelecypoda.

lamellibranchiate (lā-mel-i-brang'ki-āt), a. and n. [< NL. lamellibranchiatus, < L. lamella, a thin plate, + branchiæ, gills.] Same as lamellibranch.

lamellicorn (lā-mel'i-kôrn), a. and n. [< NL. lamellicornis, < L. lamella, a thin plate, + cornu = E. horn.] I. a. 1. Having lamellæ or a lamellate structure, as the antennæ of an insect.—2. Having lamellate antennæ, as an insect; of or pertaining to the Lamellicornia.

II. n. A lamellicorn beetle; any member of the Lamellicornia, as a scarab, dung-beetle, stag-beetle, cockchafer, etc.

lamellicornate (lā-mel-i-kôr'nāt), a. Same as lamellicorn.

Lamellicornes (lā-mel-i-kôr'nēz), n. pl. [NL. (orig. the F. accom. of NL. lamellicornia, neut. pl.), < L. lamella, a thin plate, + cornu = E. horn.] In Latreille's system, the sixth family of pentamerous Coleoptera, corresponding with the modern group Lamellicornia.

Lamellicornia (lā-mel-i-kôr'ni-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of lamellicornis: see lamellicorn.] A suborder of Coleoptera which have the fourth and fifth tarsal joints not connate, the first ventral segment visible for its entire breadth, the antennæ with a lamellate club whose apposed surfaces have a very delicate sensitive structure, and the legs fossorial. The antennæ, which are short and deeply inserted under the sides of the head, are lamelliferous, the last three joints making a lamelliform club (pectinated in Lucanidæ, whence the name Pectinicornia for this family). The lamellicorns are herbivorous, and very rich in species, of which there are more than 7,000, among them the largest and some of the most splendid beetles known. The leading families are Scarabæidæ and Lucanidæ.

lamelliferous (lam-e-lif'e-rus), a. [< L. lamella, a thin plate, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Producing lamellæ; composed of or provided with lamellæ; having a lamellate structure.

lamelliform (lā-mel'i-fôrm), a. [< L. lamella, a thin plate, + forma, form.] Lamellar in form; having the shape of a lamella; lamellate in structure or arrangement.

lamelliped (lā-mel'i-ped), a. and n. [< L. lamella, a thin plate, + pes (ped-) = E. foot.] I. a. Having a flattened lamelliform foot, as some conchiferous mollusks; of or pertaining to the Lamellipedia.

II. n. A mollusk with a lamelliform foot; one of the Lamellipedia.

Lamellipedia (lā-mel-i-pē'di-ä), n. pl. [NL., < L. lamella, a thin plate, + pes (ped-) = E. foot.] In Lamarck's system of the Conchifera, a division of acephalous mollusks having a large lamellar foot, containing the families Conchæ, Cardiacea, Arcacea, Trigonea, and Naïades. Also Lamellipedes.

lamellirostер (lā-mel-i-ros'tėr), n. A lamellirostral bird.

lamellirostral (lā-mel-i-ros'tral), a. and n. [As Lamellirostres + -al.] I. a. Having a bill furnished with flattened tooth-like projections, as a duck; of or pertaining to the Lamellirostres.

II. n. Any member of the Lamellirostres.

lamellirostrate (lā-mel-i-ros'trāt), a. Same as lamellirostral.

Lamellirostres (lā-mel-i-ros'trēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. lamella, a thin plate, + rostrum, a beak: see rostrum.] In Cuvier's classification, the fourth family of his sixth order of birds (Palmipedes), containing those which have the bill lamellosodentate and covered with a soft skin, with a nail at the end, as ducks, geese, swans, and flamingos. The family corresponds to the Linnean Anseres, and included the modern families Anatidæ and Phœnicopteridæ. Divested of the flamingos, it corresponds to the Chenomorphæ of Huxley, now commonly rated as an order or suborder of carinate birds. See Chenomorphæ, Anseres, Anatidæ.

lamellose (lam'e-lōs), a. [< lamella + -ose.] Full of lamellæ; lamellated in structure; lamelliform in arrangement: a book, for instance, is entirely lamellose.

lamellosodentate (lam-e-lō-sō-den'tāt), a. [< lamellose + dentate.] Toothed with lamellæ, or having lamelliform teeth, as the bill of a duck.

Lamellosodentati (lam-e-lō"sō-den-tā'tī), n. pl. [NL.: see lamellosodentate.] Illiger's name of the duck tribe, or lamellirostral birds. See Lamellirostres.

lamely (lām'li), adv. 1. In a lame or halting manner; like a cripple: as, to walk lamely.—2. Imperfectly; unsatisfactorily; weakly; feebly: as, a figure lamely drawn; a scene lamely described; an argument lamely conducted.

lameness (lām'nes), n. 1. The state of being lame; defect or unsoundness of a limb or limbs; especially, impairment of locomotive capacity by injury or deformity: as, lameness of the hand or foot; lameness caused by a broken or a deformed leg.—2. Imperfection; want of finish or completeness; defect; insufficiency; weakness: as, the lameness of a verse or a rime; the lameness of an argument or an apology.

Speak of my lameness, and I straight will halt.
Shak., Sonnets, lxxxix.

If the story move, or the actor help the lameness of it with his performance. Dryden, Spanish Friar.

lament (lā-ment'), n. [= Sp. Pg. It. lamento, < L. lamentum, usually in pl. lamenta, a wailing, moaning; with formative -mentum (see -ment), from the root la*, seen also in latrare, bark, Gr. ῥάζειν, snarl, Russ. laietĭ, bark, scold.] 1. An expression of grief or sorrow; a sad complaint; a lamentation.

And these external manners of laments
Are merely shadows to the unseen grief
That swells with silence in the tortured soul.
Shak., Rich. II., iv. 1. 296.

2. A set form of lamentation or mourning; an elegy; a mourning song or ballad.

At Busiris, which was the alleged burial-place of Osiris, there was an annual festival at which the votaries, having fasted and put on mourning dresses, uttered a lament round a burnt-offering: the death of Osiris being the subject of the lament. H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 144.

3. The music for an elegy, or a tune intended to express or excite sorrowful emotion; a mournful air.

lament (lā-ment'), v. [< F. lamenter = Sp. Pg. lamentar = It. lamentare, < L. lamentari, wail, weep, < lamentum, a wailing, lament: see lament, n.] I. intrans. 1. To express sorrow; utter words or sounds of grief; mourn audibly; wail.

In that day shall one take up a parable against you, and lament with a doleful lamentation. Micah ii. 4.

Every now and then I heard the wail of women lamenting for the dead. R. Curzon, Monast. in the Levant, p. 195.

2. To show great sorrow or regret; repine; chafe; grieve.

Where joy most revels, grief doth most lament;
Grief joys, joy grieves, on slender accident.
Shak., Hamlet, iii. 2. 208.

=Syn. Lament, Mourn, Grieve; sorrow. Lament expresses always, at least figuratively, an external act. Mourn was originally and is still often the same, but does not now suggest anything audible. Grieve suggests more of a consuming effect upon the person sorrowing. See affliction.

II. trans. 1. To bewail; mourn for; bemoan; deplore.

They lamented the death of their leader, and filled all places with their complaints. Bacon, Moral Fables, vii.

2†. To afflict; distress.

He went home, where he lay much Lamented and wonderfully affrighted with the Old Woman coming to afflict him. Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen [Anne, I. 124.

lamentable (lam'en-ta-bl), a. [< F. lamentable = Sp. lamentable = Pg. lamentavel = It. lamentabile, lamentable, < L. lamentabilis, mournful, < L. lamentari, mourn, lament: see lament, v.] 1. To be lamented; exciting or calling for sorrow; grievous: as, a lamentable deterioration of morals.

Tell thou the lamentable tale of me.
Shak., Rich. II., v. 1. 44.

And yet their superstition is more lamentable then their dispersion, as also their pertinacie and stubbornenesse in their superstition. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 159.

2. Expressive of grief; mournful: as, a lamentable cry.

Ceaseless rain sweeping away wildly before a long and lamentable blast. Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, i.

3. Miserable; pitiful; low; poor.

Then are messengers again posted to Rome in lamentable sort, beseeching that they would not suffer a whole Province to be destroy'd. Milton, Hist. Eng., iii.

lamentableness (lam'en-ta-bl-nes), n. The state of being lamentable.

lamentably (lam'en-ta-bli), adv. In a lamentable manner; mournfully; pitifully.

lamentation (lam-en-tā'shon), n. [< ME. lamentacioun, < OF. (and F.) lamentation = Sp. lamentación = Pg. lamentação = It. lamentazione, < L. lamentatio(n-), a weeping, < L. lamentari, weep: see lament, v.] 1. The act of bewailing; expression of sorrow; a mournful outcry.

Who sothely might suffer the sorow that thou mase . . .
Lamentacoun & langour the long night ouer?
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 3294.

In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation, and weeping, and great mourning. Mat. ii. 18.

2. [cap.] pl. The shorter title of the Lamentations of Jeremiah, one of the poetical books of the Old Testament. In the Septuagint, as in the English Bible, it stands immediately after the Book of Jeremiah, of which it probably originally formed a continuation. Its subject is the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. It was probably composed immediately after the taking of the city (586 B. C.), while the wounds of the nation were still fresh. Jeremiah has been generally regarded by Christian scholars as its author.

3. [cap.] pl. The music to which the first three lessons, taken from the Lamentations of Jeremiah, are sung in the Roman Catholic Church, in the office called Tenebræ, on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday of Holy Week. =Syn. 1. Mourning, complaint, plaint, moan, moaning, wailing, outcry. See lament, v. i.

lamenter (lā-men'tėr), n. One who laments, mourns, or cries out with sorrow.

lamentingly (lā-men'ting-li), adv. In a lamenting manner; with lamentation.

Lamé's equation, function. See equation, function.

lameskirting (lām'skėr-ting), n. [< lame[1], v., + skirt + -ing[1].] In coal-mining, the cutting off of coal from the sides of underground roads in order to widen them. [North. Eng.]

lameter, n. See lamiter.

lametta (la-met'ä), n. [It., dim. of It. lama, a plate of metal, < L. lamina, a thin piece of metal, wood, etc.: see lame[3], lamina.] Brass, silver, or gold foil or wire.

lamia (lā'mi-ä), n. [< L. lamia, < Gr. λάμια, a female demon (see def.).] 1. In Gr. and Rom. myth., an enticing witch, who charmed children and youths for the purpose of feeding on their blood and flesh, like the later vampire; a female demon; hence, in general, a destroying witch or hag.

Where's the lamia
That tears my entrails?
Massinger, Virgin-Martyr, iv. 1.

A young prince goes a hunting. . . . In the ardour of the chase, he becomes separated from his followers, and meets with a lamia or ogress.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry (ed. 1871), I. 310.

2. [cap.] In zoöl.: (a) A Fabrician (1775) genus of longicorn beetles, now the type of the family Lamiidæ. L. ædilis is a species the male of which has antennæ four times as long as the body. (b) A genus of sharks: same as Lamna. Risso, 1826.

Lamiaceæ (lā-mi-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Lamium + -aceæ.] Lindley's name for the Menthaceæ.

Lamiales (lā-mi-ā′lēz), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1876), ⟨ Lamium + -ales.] A cohort of gamopetalous plants, having the corolla usually irregular, the posterior stamens often reduced to staminodia or wanting, the carpels one- or two-ovuled, and the indehiscent fruit generally included in the calyx. It embraces the orders Myoporineæ, Selagineæ, Verbenaceæ, and Labiatæ.

Lamiariæ (lā-mi-ā′ri-ē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Lamia, 2 (a), + -ariæ.] In Latreille's system (1825), a tribe of longicorn beetles, corresponding inexactly to the modern family Lamiidæ.

Lamieæ (lā-mī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), ⟨ Lamium + -eæ.] A subtribe of labiate plants of the tribe Stachydeæ, originally embracing the genus Lamium and 9 other genera. In the system of Bentham and Hooker it embraces 22 genera.

lamiger (lam′i-jėr), n. [A variant of lamiter.] One who is lame; a cripple. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Lamiidæ (lā-mī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Lamia, 2 (a), + -idæ.] A family of longicorn beetles typified by the genus Lamia, belonging to the tetramerous series of the order Coleoptera. It is related to the Cerambycidæ, but the head is vertical, not porrect. ★Also written Lamiadæ, Lamiides.

lamina (lam′i-nä), n.; pl. laminæ (-nē). [= F. lame (> E. lame[3]) = Sp. lama, lámina = Pg. lamina = It. lama, lamina, ⟨ L. lamina, also lammina, lamna, a thin plate of wood, metal, etc., a leaf, layer, etc. Cf. lame[3].] A thin plate or scale. Specifically—(a) A layer or coat lying over another: applied to the plates of minerals, bones, etc. (b) The thinnest distinct layer into which a stratified rock can be separated. See stratum and stratification. (c) In anat., a thin plate, layer, or membrane, or any laminar or lamellar structure. [In this use commonly as mere Latin, as in phrases below.] (d) In bot.: (1) The commonly widened upper part of a petal; its limb or border, as distinguished from its claw. (2) The blade or expanded portion of a leaf. (3) The flat part of the thallus or frond in some seaweeds, as distinguished from the stipe. (e) A splint of armor. Hence —(f) A piece of armor made of splints. Compare lame[3], splint-armor, jesserant, brigandine[1].—Cribrose lamina (lamina cribrosa), a thin cribriform lamina of the sclerotic coat of the eye at the entrance of the optic nerve.—Denticulate lamina of the cochlea, the limbus laminæ spiralis.—Dorsal laminæ. See dorsal.—Elastic laminæ of the cornea, hard, elastic, transparent, and homogeneous membranes covering the proper substance of the cornea in front and behind.—Lamina cinerea, a thin layer of gray substance at the base of the brain, above the optic chiasma, from the fore end of the corpus callosum to the tuber cinereum.—Lamina dermalis, in embryol., the primary outer layer of a two-layered germ: same as ectoderm.—Laminæ dorsales, in embryol., the dorsal laminæ.—Laminæ of a vertebra, plate-like portions of the neurapophyses or neural arches of a vertebra, arising from the pedicels on each side and meeting in midline to inclose the spinal canal.—Laminæ of the cerebellum, primary, secondary, and tertiary, the folded and ramifying layers of the surface of the cerebellum, like the gyri of the cerebrum, section of which gives the appearance called arbor-vitæ.—Laminæ ventrales, or laminæ viscerales, ventral or visceral layers; the folds of the embryo, on each side of the notochordal axis, extending downward to meet finally on the middle line below, each lamina splitting into an outer or somatopleural and an inner or splanchnopleural layer, the outer to form the body-walls, the inner to form the intestinal canal: opposed to dorsal laminæ.—Lamina fusca, an extremely fine areolar tissue forming the innermost part of the sclerotic and uniting it with the outer surface of the choroid.—Lamina gastralis, in embryol., the primary inner layer of a two-layered germ: same as endoderm.—Lamina inodermalis, the outer or flesh layer of the mesoderm of a four-layered germ; the somatopleure.—Lamina inogastralis, the inner or fibrous intestinal layer of the mesoderm of a four-layered germ; the splanchnopleure.—Lamina labialis, Meinert's name for that piece of the mouth-parts of a myriapod which supports the inner stipes of the deutomala. See deutomala.—Lamina mycogastralis, the mucous layer or glandular intestinal layer of a four-layered germ. It corresponds to the endoderm of a two-layered germ, and forms the epithelium of the intestinal tract and its diverticula.—Lamina neurodermalis, the skin-sensory layer of a four-layered germ, corresponding to the ectoderm of a two-layered germ, and forming the epidermis and the chief parts of the nervous system and the organs of the special senses.—Lamina perforata anterior, the anterior perforated space of the base of the brain; the precribrum.—Lamina perforata posterior, the posterior perforated space of the base of the brain; the postcribrum.—Lamina perpendicularis, the mesethmoid, or perpendicular median plate of the ethmoid bone.—Lamina proligera, lamina sporigera, in fungology, according to the older terminology, the hymenium or discus in a discocarp or apothecium.—Lamina quadrigemina, the dorsal portion of the mesencephalon above the Sylvian aqueduct. It is divided into the four corpora quadrigemina.—Lamina reticularis, the reticular lamina of the organ of Corti, a net-like membrane upon the summits of the outer hair-cells. The network consists of four rows of fiddle-shaped cells called phalanges, between which project the ciliated free ends of the hair-cells, and to which are attached the phalangeal processes of the cells of Dieters.—Lamina spiralis, the spiral lamina of the cochlea; the flange or projection which winds spirally round the modiolus or columella of the ear, projecting into the spiral canal and dividing it into two spiral tubes or scalæ. The spiral lamina is partly bony and partly membranous. The osseous part is called lamina spiralis ossea; the membranous part is the membrana basilaris. The bony lamina ends at the cupola in a hook-like process, the hamulus.—Lamina spiralis membranacea, the basilar membrane of the cochlear canal.—Lamina spiralis ossea, the bony spiral lamina winding around the modiolus of the cochlea and giving attachment at its free edge to the basilar membrane.—Lamina suprachoroidea, a delicate membrane investing the choroid coat of the eye externally.—Lamina tectoria cerebelli, that part of the cerebellum which lies above the horizontal fissure.—Lamina terminalis, the anterior boundary of the third ventricle of the brain; that part of the lamina cinerea lying in front of the chiasma. See cut under encephalon.—Lamina vitrea. (a) A colorless glassy membrane forming the innermost stratum of the choroid and lying between the choriocapillaris and the tapetum nigrum; the membrane of Bruch. (b) The inner table of the skull.—Neural lamina, the dorsal lamina, one of the lips of the groove along the back of the early embryo, which, meeting and joining its fellow, converts the primitive trace or furrow into a tube within which the neural axis is to be developed: opposed to ventral or visceral lamina.—Reticular lamina of Kölliker, in the cochlea, same as lamina reticularis, above.—Ventral or visceral laminæ. See laminæ ventrales, above.=Syn. Lamina, lamella. In zoölogy and anatomy these words are usually absolutely synonymous, used interchangeably and without distinction. If there be a possible distinction, it is that lamella may oftener apply to something smaller or thinner than a lamina: for instance, the cover of a book is a lamina, containing leaves or lamellæ. Haeckel draws and maintains this distinction in embryology.

laminability (lam″i-na-bil′i-ti), n. [⟨ laminable: see -bility.] The quality of being laminable.

laminable (lam′i-na-bl), a. [⟨ lamin(ate) + -able.] Capable of being formed into thin plates; capable of being extended by passing between steel or hardened cast-iron rollers, as a metal.

laminæ, n. Plural of lamina.

laminar (lam′i-när), a. [⟨ lamina + -ar[3].] 1. Composed of or disposed in laminæ, or thin plates or layers; lamellar.—2. Having or being a lamina or laminæ; laminate.—Laminar fission, in geol., separation into laminæ, thin plates, or flags, parallel with the lines of stratification; lamination.

Laminaria (lam-i-nā′ri-ä), n. [NL., ⟨ L. lamina, a thin plate, + -aria.] A genus of brown ★seaweeds, belonging to the family Laminariaceæ, having no definite leaves, but a plain ribless expansion, flat and bladelike (whence the name), which is either simple or cloven. L. digitata is the well-known tangle abundant on sea-coasts (used in gynecology instead of sponge for making tents for dilating the cervical canal); L. buccinalis is a native of the Cape of Good Hope, and yields iodine; L. potatorum grows in Australia, and furnishes the aborigines with a part of their instruments, vessels, and food; L. digitata and L. bulbosa were formerly employed in the manufacture of kelp for the glass-maker and soap-boiler; L. saccharina, the sweet-tangle or sea-belt, named from the saccharine matter called mannite which it furnishes, is abundant on the shores of the North Atlantic and Pacific oceans. See hanger, 7.

Laminariaceæ (lam-i-nā-ri-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Laminaria + -aceæ.] A family of the Algæ or seaweeds, now included in the class Phæophyceæ. Their fronds are coriaceous and not articulated, and attached to the sea-bottom by a root-like or sometimes disk-like organ, whence arises a stipe, which expands into a lamina or blade. They are propagated by means of zoöspores, borne in zoösporangia on the surface of the frond, either diffused or in patches. The genera Alaria, Laminaria, and Macrocystis, of this family, include the largest marine plants. See the generic names, and kelp.

laminarian (lam-i-nā′ri-an), a. [⟨ Laminaria + -an.] Pertaining to the genus Laminaria; specifically, noting that belt or zone of marine life which extends from low-water mark to a depth of forty to ninety feet, and which in British seas is characterized by the presence of Laminariaceæ, as well as by that of starfishes, the common sea-urchin, etc.

> The Laminarian zone is succeeded by the Coralline zone. Sir C. W. Thomson, Depths of the Sea, p. 16.

Laminarieæ (lam″i-nā-rī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Laminaria + -eæ.] A synonym of Laminariaceæ.

Laminarites (lam″i-nā-rī′tēz), n. [NL., ⟨ Laminaria + -ites.] The generic name given by Sternberg to fragments of plants supposed to be allied to the recent Laminaria. More than 20 species have been named, but most of them are problematical. Some may be fossil seaweeds.

laminary (lam′i-nā-ri), a. [⟨ lamina + -ary.] Composed of layers or plates; laminar.

laminate (lam′i-nāt), v.; pret. and pp. laminated, ppr. laminating. [⟨ ML. laminatus, pp. of laminare (> It. laminare = Sp. Pg. laminar = F. laminer, plate, flatten into a plate), ⟨ L. lamina, a thin plate: see lamina.] I. trans. 1. To form into a lamina or plate; beat out thin. [Rare.]

> We took an ounce of that [refined silver], and, having laminated it, we cast it upon twice its weight of beaten sublimate. Boyle, Works, III. 81.

2. To form with or into laminæ or layers; divide into plates or leaves: as, a laminating-machine.—Laminated arch. See arch[1].—Laminated pipe, a pipe made by wrapping successive layers of thin veneer, or veneer and fabrics in combination, over a mold or core.—Laminated rib. Same as laminated arch.—Laminated tubercle, the nodule of the cerebellum.

II. intrans. To part or become divided into laminæ; separate into thin layers or plates: as, mica laminates on exposure to heat.

laminate (lam′i-nāt), a. [⟨ ML. laminatus, furnished with plates or scales: see the verb.] 1. Having the form of a lamina or thin plate; leaf-like: as, the laminate coxæ of some beetles. —2. Disposed in, consisting of, or bearing laminæ, layers, or scales; laminar; scaled; scaly: as, laminate structure in geology; a laminate surface; the laminate tarsi of a bird.—Laminate coxa, a coxa dilated into a broad plate which covers the trochanter and the base of the femur, as the posterior coxæ of certain aquatic beetles.—Laminate horn, a horn-like process dilated at its base into a thin plate.

laminated (lam′i-nā-ted), p. a. [⟨ laminate + -ed[2].] Same as laminate.

laminating-machine (lam′i-nā-ting-ma-shēn″), n. In metal-working, a machine for making metallic sheets; in particular, a set of gold-beaters' rolls arranged in a frame with gearing and adjustable bearings, the adjustment of the bearings being effected by screws, and the rollers being turned by a winch. The gold ingot is by this machine (with frequent annealing to prevent cracking) reduced to a ribbon weighing 6½ grains per inch, which is cut into pieces about one inch square to form the gold-beaters' pack, the beating of which, again with frequent annealing, reduces the metal to gold-leaf.

laminating-roller (lam′i-nā-ting-rō″lėr), n. In metal-working, one of a set of rollers in a rolling-mill, for reducing fagots or blooms to sheets or bars. The rollers act in pairs, and their distance apart determines the thickness of the sheet. This distance is regulated by adjustable bearings moved accurately by screws. For bars the rollers are grooved in accordance with the required shape of the cross-section. The blooms or fagots are rolled hot; but cylindrical bars for shafts are in some manufactories finished by cold-rolling. ★ lamination (lam-i-nā′shon), n. [⟨ laminate + -ion.] The act of laminating, or the state of being laminated; arrangement in layers or thin plates; specifically, in geol., a division of rock into layers or laminæ: nearly the same as stratification. A stratified rock may or may not be laminated. In the former case each stratum or bed is capable of being divided into thin layers or laminæ. Lamination is hardly possible except in rocks made up of fine-grained materials. The break or interval separating two strata is more evident, and very probably was of longer duration, than that which intervened between the deposition of two successive laminæ. Some English geologists use the term lamination with reference to the crystalline and eruptive rocks, making laminated structure the equivalent of tabular structure, where this has been the result not of stratification but of contraction during the process of cooling, or of some other cause connected with the formation of masses of igneous origin.

> Four kinds of fissility may be recognized among rocks: 1st, lamination of original deposit; 2d, cleavage, as in slate; 3d, shearing, as near faults; 4th, foliation, as in schists. A. Geikie, Text-Book of Geol. (2d ed.), p. 463.

laminiferous (lam-i-nif′e-rus), a. [⟨ L. lamina, a thin plate, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Bearing laminæ; having a laminate structure.

laminiform (lam′i-ni-fôrm), a. [⟨ L. lamina, a thin plate, + forma, form.] Having the form of a lamina; laminar; lamellar; like a plate, layer, or leaf in shape.

laminiplantar (lam″i-ni-plan′tär), a. [⟨ L. lamina, a thin plate, + planta, sole.] Having laminate tarsi; having the back of the tarsus covered with an undivided lamina on each side, the two meeting in a sharp ridge: opposed to scuteliplantar.

Laminiplantares (lam″i-ni-plan-tā′rēz), n. pl. [NL.: see laminiplantar.] Laminiplantar birds; in Sundevall's classification (1872), the prior series of the first order of birds (Oscines), including nearly all oscine Passeres.

laminiplantation (lam″i-ni-plan-tā′shon), n. [As laminiplant(ar) + -ation.] The state or quality of being laminiplantar.

> The laminiplantation . . . is equally well exhibited by most passerine birds, whether they have booted or anteriorly scutellate tarsi. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 126.

laminitis (lam-i-nī′tis), n. [NL., ⟨ lamina + -itis.] Inflammation of the laminæ of the hoof of a horse.

laminose (lam′i-nōs), a. [⟨ NL. laminosus, ⟨ L. lamina, a thin plate: see lamina.] Resembling a lamina; laminiform. Cooke, Brit. Fungi, p. 314.

lamish (lā′mish), a. [⟨ lame[1] + -ish[1].] Somewhat lame; slightly limping. Wood, Athenæ Oxon., II., J. Shirley.

lamiter (lā′mi-tėr), n. [Also lameter. Prob. orig. limiter, a begging friar, later associated with lame.] One who is lame; a cripple. [Prov. Eng.]

Though ye may think him a lamiter, yet, grippie for grippie, friend, I'll wad a wether he'll gar the blude spin frae under your nails. Scott, Black Dwarf, xvii.

You have now, no doubt, friends who will look after you, and not suffer you to devote yourself to a blind lameter like me? Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xxxvii.

Lamium (lā′mi-um), n. [NL. (Linnæus), < L. lamium, the dead-nettle.] A genus of labiate plants of the tribe Stachydeæ, type of the subtribe Lamieæ, with nearly equal, not acerose calyx-teeth, the corolla-tube rarely exserted, the anther-cells generally parallel, and the nutlets angled and truncated at the apex. They are annual or perennial herbs, often diffuse or decumbent at the base, with cordate toothed or incised leaves, and densely many-flowered whorls of flowers crowded at the summit of the stem. The irregular galeate flowers are sometimes large, and generally pink or purple, sometimes white or even yellow. There are nearly 40 species of these plants, inhabiting Europe, northern Africa, and extratropical Asia. Several species are common as weeds in waste ground, and some are occasionally cultivated in gardens. They are all known by the name of dead-nettle or hedge dead-nettle. The best-known species are the white-flowered L. album, the pink- or purple-flowered L. purpureum, L. amplexicaule, and L. maculatum, and the yellow-flowered L. Galeobdolon.

lamm[1], v. t. See lam[1].

lamm[2]†, n. An obsolete variant of lame[3].

Lammas (lam′as), n. [< ME. lammasse, < AS. hlammæsse, a later assimilated form of hlāfmæsse, lit. 'loaf-mass,' i. e. 'bread-feast' (see def.), < hlāf, loaf, bread, + mæsse, mass: see loaf[1] and mass[1].] 1. Originally, in England, the festival of the wheat-harvest, observed on the 1st of August, corresponding to the 13th in the modern calendar. It is supposed to have taken its name from the practice of offering first-fruits at the service of the mass on that day, in the form of loaves of bread. The festival was a continuation of a similar one from pagan times. Some have supposed, erroneously, that the name has some connection with the word lamb.

And to the lammasse afterward he spousede the quene. Rob. of Gloucester, p. 317.

2. In Great Britain, the 1st of August as a date, which in Scotland is a quarter-day and in England a half-quarter-day. The prevalence of this use, both in ancient and modern times, has to a great extent obscured the original significance of the word. Also called Lammas-day.

3. The church festival of St. Peter's Chains, or St. Peter in the Fetters, observed on August 1st in memory of St. Peter's imprisonment and miraculous deliverance (Acts xii. 4–10).—Lammas eve, July 31st, the day before Lammas.

Even or odd, of all days in the year,
Come Lammas-eve at night shall she be fourteen.
Shak., R. and J., i. 3. 17.

Latter Lammas, a Lammas that, like the Greek calends, does not exist: used ironically, implying 'never.'

Courtiers thriue at latter Lammas day.
Gascoigne, Steele Glas (ed. Arber), p. 55.

Lammas-day (lam′as-dā), n. Same as Lammas, 2.

lammas-land (lam′as-land), n. Land which is cultivated by individual occupiers, but after harvest (about the time of Lammas) is thrown open for common pasturage. F. Pollock, Land Laws, ii. [Eng.]

Lammas-tide (lam′as-tīd), n. The time or season of Lammas.

How long is it now
To Lammas-tide? Shak., R. and J., i. 3. 15.

lammer (lam′ėr), n. and a. [Also lamer, lamour, laumer, lambur; appar. < F. l'ambre, < le, the, ambre, amber: see amber[2].] Amber. [Scotch.]

Bedis of correll and lammer.
Aberdeen Regis. (1548), V. 20. (Jamieson.)

Dinna ye think puir Jeanie's een wi' the tears in them glanced like lamour beads?
Scott, Heart of Mid-Lothian, xii.

lammergeier, laemmergeier (lam′ėr-, lem′ėr-gī-ėr), n. [< G. lämmergeier, < lämmer, pl. of lamm = E. lamb, + geier, a vulture (see under gerfalcon).] A very large diurnal bird of prey, the so-called bearded vulture or griffin of the Alps, Gypaëtus barbatus, of the family Falconidæ, or placed in a separate family Gypaëtidæ (which see). The bird is an eagle of somewhat vulturine habits. It is the largest European bird of prey, about 40 inches long from point of beak to end of tail, the wing from the carpal angle 30 inches, the tail 20. The upper parts are blackish; the head is white, with a black line on each side and tufts of black bristly feathers at the base of the bill; the under parts are tawny. It stoops to carrion like most other eagles, but is also powerful and rapacious enough to destroy chamois, lambs, kids, hares, etc. The bird ranges through the mountains of southern Europe and northeastern Africa, and thence through central Asia to northern China. See cut under Gypaëtus. Also written lammergeir, lemmergeyer, laemmergeyer.

lammie[1], n. See lambie.

lammy, lammie[2] (lam′i), n.; pl. lammies (-iz). [Perhaps a particular use of lammie[1], lambie.] A thick quilted frock or short jumper made of flannel or blanket-cloth, worn by sailors as an outside garment in cold weather. Gentleman's Mag., October, 1886, p. 390.

Lamna (lam′nä), n. [NL., < Gr. λάμνα, a kind of shark.] The typical genus of Lamnidæ, containing sharks of remarkable swiftness and ferocity. Lamna cornubica is the mackerel-shark or porbeagle. See cut under mackerel-shark.

Lamnidæ (lam′ni-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lamna + -idæ.] A family of typical sharks represented by the genus Lamna, to which various limits have been ascribed. (a) In Günther's system, a family of Selachoidei, with no nictitating membrane, an anal and two dorsal fins (the first of which is opposite the space between the pectorals and the ventrals), nostrils not confluent with the mouth, which is inferior, and spiracles none or minute. (b) In recent systems, a family of typical sharks, having the first dorsal between the pectorals and the ventrals, the second small, the tail keeled on the side, all the five branchial apertures in advance of the pectorals and of moderate size, and the teeth large. The porbeagles and the mackerel-sharks are the best-known forms. Also Lamnoidæ.

Lamnina (lam-nī′nä), n. pl. [NL., < Lamna + -ina[2].] In Günther's ichthyological system, a group of Lamnidæ: same as Lamnidæ (b).

lamnoid (lam′noid), a. and n. [< Lamna + -oid.] I. a. Pertaining to the Lamnidæ, or having their characters.

★ II. n. One of the Lamnidæ.

lamp[1] (lamp), n. [Early mod. E. lampe; < ME. lampe, laumpe = D. lamp = MLG. lampe = MHG. G. lampe = Dan. lampe = Sw. lampa, < OF. (also F.) lampe = Sp. lampo = Pg. lampeão = It. lampa, lampade, < L. lampas (lampad-), < Gr. λαμπάς (λαμπαδ-), a torch, wax-light, lamp (oil-lamp), beacon, meteor, any light, < λάμπειν, shine. Cf. lantern, from the same ult. source.] 1. A vessel, generally portable, for containing an inflammable liquid and a wick so arranged that it lifts the liquid by capillary attraction and when ignited at the end serves as a means of illumination; in recent use also, by extension, a device employed for the same purpose in which the source of illumination is ignited gas or electricity. Lamps are distinguished by the liquids used in them, as alcohol-lamp, oil-lamp, etc., and by their mode of construction or their use, as Argand lamp, astral lamp, etc.

Ancient Roman Lamps, in the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston.

And rule vs by rightwisnes in our Ranke dedis,
With a lyue of lewte, that as a laump shynes.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 4849.

The pure candlestick, with the lamps thereof, even with the lamps to be set in order. Ex. xxxix. 37.

2. Figuratively, something suggesting the light of a lamp, whether in appearance or use; anything possessing or communicating light, real or metaphorical.

Thy gentle eyes send forth a quickening spirit,
And feed the dying lamp of life within me. Rowe.

3. pl. Same as gig-lamps. See gig-lamp, 3. [Slang.]—Aphlogistic lamp. See aphlogistic.—Arc-lamp, a lamp in which the light is given out by an electric arc. See electric light, under electric.—Argand lamp, a lamp, patented by M. Argand in 1787, having a tubular wick, which is fed upward between two concentric metal tubes. Air is admitted to the interior of the flame as well as to the exterior.—Astral lamp. See astral.—Clutch-lamp. See electric light, under electric.—Davy lamp, Davy's lamp. See davy[1].—Döbereiner's lamp, a contrivance for producing an instantaneous light, invented by Professor Döbereiner, of Jena, in 1824. The light is produced by throwing a jet of hydrogen gas upon recently prepared spongy platinum, when the metal instantly becomes red-hot, and then sets fire to the gas. This action depends upon the readiness with which spongy platinum absorbs gases, more especially oxygen gas. The hydrogen is brought into such close contact with oxygen (derived from the atmosphere) in the pores of the platinum that chemical union takes place on the surface of the platinum, with evolution of sufficient heat to ignite the rest of the hydrogen. Also called hydrogen lamp.—Electric lamp. See electric and glow-lamp.—Fresnel lamp, a lamp in which the light is placed behind a Fresnel lens, or is inclosed in a glass of which the section is that of a Fresnel lens.—Hydrogen lamp. Same as Dobereiner's lamp.—Hydrostatic lamp, a lamp in which a column of water raises the oil to the wick.—Mechanical lamp. Same as carcel-lamp.—Monochromatic lamp, a lamp burning a mixture of alcohol and salt, to produce a yellow monochromatic light.—Oxyhydrogen lamp. See oxyhydrogen.—Spirit-lamp, a lamp of any form for burning alcohol. It is most commonly a lamp of very simple type, consisting of a receptacle of glass or sheet-metal, fitted with a cylindrical tube to carry a wick.—Standard lamp, a hand-lamp with a tall standard, generally movable, made to stand on the floor. The tall fixed lamps in the chancels of churches are also known as standard lamps.—Student lamp, or students' lamp, a portable lamp with an Argand burner, supplied by a cylindrical self-flowing oil-reservoir connected with the burner by a downward-curving tube. Reservoir and burner are carried on an upright standard passing through the tube, and can be raised or lowered on the standard at pleasure. The burner is fitted with a tall chimney and a conical porcelain shade.—Submarine lamp, any form of lamp designed to burn under water. It is now particularly an electric light that may be suspended under water for lighting wrecks or submarine explorations, constructions, etc.—Sun lamp, a form of electric incandescent lamp, resembling an arc-lamp, the light being given out by a piece of lime, magnesia, or other refractory substance, placed between the ends of two carbon rods and rendered incandescent by an electric current.—To smell of the lamp, to show traces of the use of "midnight oil"; bear the marks of great and protracted labor; be labored and pedantic in style or abstruse in character: said of literary work.

A work not smelling of the lamp to-night,
But fitted for your Majesty's disport,
And writ to the meridian of your court.
B. Jonson, Staple of News, Prol.

lamp[1] (lamp), v. [< lamp[1], n.] I. trans. To furnish light to; light. [Rare.]

Set tapers to the toumbe, and lampe the church.
Marston, Antonio and Mellida, II., iii. 1.

II. intrans. To shine. [Rare.]

A cheerliness did with her hopes arise,
That lamped cleerer than it did before.
Daniel, Civil Wars, viii. 64.

lamp[2] (lamp), v. i. [Prob. akin to limp[1], as cramp[1] to crimp.] To go or run quickly; scamper. [Scotch.]

It was all her father's own fault, that let her run lamping about the country, riding on bare-backed naigs.
Scott, Monastery, xxxiii.

lamp[3]†, n. [ME., also lampe, for lame*, < OF. lame, a thin plate: see lame[3].] A thin plate.

In an erthen potte how put is al, . . .
And wel ycovered with a lamp of glas.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 211.

lampad (lam′pad), n. [< L. lampas (lampad-), < Gr. λαμπάς (λαμπαδ-), a torch: see lamp[1].] A lamp or candlestick; a torch. [Rare.]

Him who 'mid the golden lampads went. Trench.

lampadary (lam′pa-dā-ri), n.; pl. lampadaries (-riz). [< ML. lampadarius, < MGr. λαμπαδάριος, < Gr. λαμπάς (λαμπαδ-), lamp: see lamp[1].] An officer in the Greek Church who has the care of the church lamps, and carries a lighted taper before the patriarch in processions.

lampade (lam′pād), n. [Also lampado; < L. lampas (lampad-), a torch: see lamp[1].] A lamp-shell. Meuschen, 1787; Humphreys, 1797.

lampadedromy (lam-pa-ded′rō-mi), n. [< Gr. λαμπαδηδρομία, λαμπαδοδρομία, torch-race, < λαμπάς (λαμπαδ-), a torch, + δρόμος, a race.] In Gr. antiq., a torch-race. Each contestant carried a lighted torch, and the prize was won by him who first reached the goal with his torch unextinguished.

lampadephore (lam-pad′ē-fōr), n. [< Gr. λαμπαδηφόρος, a torch-bearer, < λαμπάς (λαμπαδ-), a torch, + φέρειν = E. bear[1].] In Gr. antiq., a contestant in a torch-race.

lampadephoria (lam-pad-ē-fō′ri-ä), n. [< Gr. λαμπαδηφορία, the bearing of torches, a torch-race, < λαμπαδηφόρος, a torch-bearer: see lampadephore.] In Gr. antiq., a torch-race in honor of a fire-god, as Prometheus or Hephæstus (Vulcan). At Athens it was held on a moonless night, the torches being lighted at the altar of the divinity whom it was intended to honor, and the course being from this altar to the Acropolis.

lampadephoros (lam-pa-def′ō-ros), n. [Gr. λαμπαδηφόρος: see lampadephore.] Same as lampadephore.

lampades, n. Plural of lampas[2], 1.

Lampadias (lam-pā′di-as), n. [NL., < Gr. λαμπαδίας, a torch-bearer, a comet, the star Aldebaran, < λαμπάς (λαμπαδ-), a lamp, torch: see lamp[1].] 1. Ptolemy's name for the bright star of the Hyades, a Tauri, or Aldebaran.—2. A bearded comet. E. Phillips, 1706.

lampadist (lam′pa-dist), n. [< Gr. λαμπαδιστής, torch-bearer, < λαμπαδίζειν, run the torch-race, < λαμπάς (λαμπαδ-), a torch: see lamp[1], lampad.] In Gr. antiq., one who took part in a torch-race; a lampadephore.

lampadite (lam′pa-dīt), n. [Named (1841) after W. A. Lampadius, who first described it.] A variety of wad or earthy manganese, containing a small percentage of oxid of copper.

lampado (lam-pā′dō), n. Same as lampade.

lampadomancy (lam-pad′ō-man-si), n. [< Gr. λαμπάς (λαμπαδ-), lamp, + μαντεία, divination.] An ancient method of divination from the variations in the color and motions of the flame of a lamp or torch.

lampas[1], lampass (lam'pas), n. [Also lampers, etc., < F. lampas, lampas (see def.) (> It. lampasco), in OF. lampas, a disease producing intense thirst; compare arroser (or humecter) le lampas, 'wet one's whistle': origin unknown.] In farriery, a congestion and swelling of the fleshy lining of the roof of the mouth immediately behind the fore teeth in the horse. It soon subsides if left to itself.

His horse . . . troubled with the lampass.
Shak., T. of the S., iii. 2. 52.

lampas[2] (lam'pas), n. [NL., < Gr. λαμπάς, a lamp: see lamp[1].] 1. Pl. lampades (-pa-dēz). An early quasi-generic or collective name of the lamp-shells, or such of the arthropomatous brachiopods as were known a century ago, especially Terebratulidæ. The word is not now used as the name of a genus, and has a plural. See lampade. Sometimes spelled lampus.

2. [cap.] A genus of Foraminifera: same as Robulina. Montfort, 1808.—3. [cap.] A genus of gastropods, closely related to Ravella. Schumacher, 1817.

lampas[3] (lam'pas), n. [< F. lampas (see def.).] Originally, Chinese flowered silk; hence, in modern times, a material of decorative character for upholstery, made of silk and wool.

lampass, n. See lampas[1].

lampblack (lamp'blak), n. [< lamp[1] + black, being orig. made by means of a lamp or torch.] A fine black pigment consisting of particles of carbon, pure or almost pure, used for making paints and ink. It reflects only about two per cent. of the incident light. It was formerly made by burning crude oils with the least supply of air possible for combustion, in order to produce a smoky flame, the soot being collected in a receptacle called a lampblack-furnace, and was prepared for use by being heated to redness in iron boxes. It is now generally made by allowing gas-flames to impinge on cylinders of iron chilled by a stream of cold water flowing through them. The lampblack collects on the cold surfaces, and is removed and collected by machinery. This form of lampblack is known as carbon-black or gas-black.—Lampblack-furnace, a cylindrical chamber lined with sheepskin or canvas, with a cone-shaped top having a cowl for the escape of the more volatile products of combustion. At one side of the chamber is a smaller compartment with a grate, over the fire in which is placed a vessel containing a hydrocarbon, resin, coal-tar, or a similar substance. The carbon product of combustion adheres to the lining of the furnace-chamber, from which it is scraped by a special mechanism and collected at intervals. E. H. Knight.

Lampblack-furnace.

lampblack (lamp'blak), v. t. [< lampblack, n.] To treat with lampblack; coat with lampblack.

You that newly come from lamblacking the Judges Shoes, and are not fit to wipe mine.
Wycherley, Plain Dealer, iii. 1.

The thickly lampblacked surface, then, and the retinal screen provided by nature in the eye, both exercise selective absorption. Philosophical Mag., XXVII. 2.

lamp-burner (lamp'bėr″nėr), n. That part of or attachment to a lamp at or in which the wick is kept burning. Lamp-burners are made in a great number of types and sizes. The simplest, as those of common spirit-lamps, are merely tubes of sheet-metal; but they usually include some device, as a serrated wheel, for raising and lowering the wick, a hood of some form to concentrate a current of air on the flame, and often a gallery or socket, pierced for ventilation, to support a chimney. See burner.

lamp-canopy (lamp'kan″ō-pi), n. A large and elaborate smoke-bell. Car-Builder's Dict.

lamp-case (lamp'kās), n. 1. In a street- or tram-car, a box with a glazed door placed inside an end window to receive a lamp. A light or eye of colored glass is usually placed opposite it on the exterior side, that the light may serve as a signal.

2. In Great Britain, a cylindrical sheet of iron serving to protect the roof-lamp of a railway-carriage. Car-Builder's Dict.

lamp-cement (lamp'sē-ment″), n. A cement for securing brass mountings on glass, as on lamps. It is made by boiling 3 parts of resin with 1 part of caustic soda in 5 parts of water. The resulting soap is mixed with half its weight of plaster of Paris, zinc white, white lead, or precipitated chalk. Petroleum and burning-fluids of similar character do not affect it. E. H. Knight.

lamp-chimney (lamp'chim″ni), n. A tube or funnel of glass or other material so placed as to increase the flame of a lamp. Its use is to protect the flame, promote combustion by increasing the draft, and conduct away the smoke and gases.

lamp-cone (lamp'kōn), n. A conical or dome-shaped cap of sheet-metal covering the burner of an oil-lamp, and having a slit in the top through which the flame projects. It serves to promote combustion by concentrating air-currents on both sides of the flame.

lamper[1] (lam'pėr), n. One who goes from house to house every day cleaning and filling lamps for a small fee. [Colloq., U. S.]

lamper[2] (lam'pėr), n. A dialectal variation of lamprey.

lamper-eel (lam'pėr-ēl'), n. [< lamper[2] + eel, from the resemblance in form to an eel.] 1. A lamprey.—2. The mutton-fish or eel-pout, Zoarces anguillaris, a fish of the family Lycodidæ, inhabiting the Atlantic coast of North America from Labrador to Delaware, and representing a section of the genus Zoarces in which the fin-rays and vertebræ are increased in number. It is of a reddish-brown color, mottled with olive, and has a dark streak along the side of the head; it attains a length of 20 inches.

lampern (lam'pėrn), n. [See lamprey.] The river-lamprey, Petromyzon fluviatilis.

lampers (lam'pėrz), n. See lampas[1].

lampet (lam'pet), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of limpet.

Lampetra (lam'pe-trä), n. [L., a lamprey: see lamprey.] 1†. An old quasi-generic book-name of a lamprey. Willughby, 1636.—2. A genus of river-lampreys, as L. fluviatilis. See Ammocœtes and lamprey.

lamp-flower (lamp'flou″ėr), n. Any plant of the genus Lychnis.

lamp-fly (lamp'flī), n. A firefly. [Rare.]

While in and out the terrace plants, and round
One branch of tall datura, waxed and waned
The lampfly lured there, wanting the white flower.
Browning, Ring and Book, i. 496.

lampful†, a. [< lamp[1] + -ful.] Full of lamps or lights; starry.

A temporall beauty of the lampfull skies,
Where powerfull Nature showes her freshest Dies.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Ark.

lamp-furnace (lamp'fėr″nās), n. A furnace in which the heat is afforded by a lamp, as distinguished from one heated by a gas-jet, a Bunsen burner, charcoal, or the like. E. H. Knight.

lamp-glass (lamp'glȧs), n. Same as lamp-chimney.

lamp-globe (lamp'glōb), n. A lamp-shade or lamp-chimney of a globular form.

lamp-hanger (lamp'hang″ėr), n. A device for supporting a gas-lamp suspended below a chandelier; a lamp-elevator. It has usually a telescopic gas-pipe, and some attachment such as a lazy-tongs or balanced chains, for raising or lowering the lamp.

lamp-head (lamp'hed), n. 1. The part of an incandescent electric lamp that fits into the holder.—2. The electromotive force in an electric lamp.

lamp-holder (lamp'hōl″dėr), n. A device for securing a lamp to its support; specifically, a socket or holder fitted with electric terminals, into which the top of the glass globe of an incandescent lamp is fitted, or from which it hangs.

lamp-hole (lamp'hōl), n. A hole or opening to receive a lamp, or to admit of the passage of a lamp, as in some sewers.

Smaller openings, large enough to allow a lamp to be lowered for purposes of inspection, are called lampholes, and are often built up of vertical lengths of drain-pipe.
Encyc. Brit., XXI. 714.

lamp-hoop (lamp'höp), n. A ring with an interior screw-thread attached to a cheap oil-lamp to receive the burner. Car-Builder's Dict.

lamping (lam'ping), a. [< lamp[1] + -ing[2].] Shining; sparkling. [Rare.]

And happy lines! on which, with starry light,
Those lamping eyes will deigne sometimes to look.
Spenser, Sonnets, i.

lampion (lam'pi-ọn), n. [F., a small lamp, < lampe, a lamp: see lamp[1].] A small lamp suitable for illuminations.

At the French Chancellerie they had six more lampions in their illumination than ours had. Thackeray.

Eh? Down the court three lampions flare;
Put forward your best foot.
Browning, Respectability.

Hidden among the leaves were millions of fantastically colored lampions seeming like so many glow-worms.
G. W. Cable, Stories of Louisiana, xv.

lamp-iron (lamp'ī″ėrn), n. A metallic socket or holder to receive a lamp or lantern, as on a railway-carriage. [British.]

lampist (lam'pist), n. [= F. lampist; as lamp + -ist.] 1. A workman skilled in the manufacture and repair of lamps; specifically, an artisan employed in the United States lighthouse establishment for that work.

I have submitted the lamp burning Petroleum to the inspection of the most experienced lampists who were accessible.
Silliman, quoted in Cone and Johns's Petrolia, iv.

2. See the quotation.

Allampadati, or Lampists, who during Passion Week and at the great festivals begged oil for the lamps which are lighted in front of the host, or the images of the virgin.
Ribton-Turner, Vagrants and Vagrancy, p. 559.

lampit (lam'pit), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of limpet.

lamp-jack (lamp'jak), n. A hood or covering placed over a lamp-vent or lamp-chimney on the outside of a railroad-car, to shield the light from rain and wind. E. H. Knight.

lamplight (lamp'līt), n. The light shed by a lamp or lamps.

Gold glittering thro' lamplight dim.
Tennyson, Arabian Nights.

lamplighter (lamp'lī″tėr), n. [< lamp[1] + lighter[1].] 1. A person employed to light street-lamps.—2. A piece of paper rolled into a spill, used to light lamps.—3. A torch used for lighting gas-lamps.—4. The bass (fish). [Local, U. S.]

lampoon (lam-pön'), n. [< F. lampon, a lampoon, orig. a drinking-song, < lampons, let us drink, 1st pers. pl. impv. of lamper, drink, nasalized form of OF. lapper, laper, drink, of OLG. origin, AS. lapian, etc., lap, drink: see lap[1], v.] A sarcastic writing aimed at a person's character, habits, or actions; a personal satire; a sarcastic diatribe; humorous abuse in writing.

Here they still paste up their drolling lampoons and scurrilous papers. Evelyn, Diary, Feb. 20, 1645.

These personal and scandalous libels, carried to excess in the reign of Charles II., acquired the name of lampoon, from the burden sung to them: "Lampone, lampone, camerada lampone"—"Guzzler, guzzler, my fellow guzzler." Scott.

=Syn. Lampoon, Pasquinade, Invective, Satire. The difference between lampoon and pasquinade is not great, but perhaps a lampoon is more malicious, more directly aimed to insult and degrade, while a pasquinade is shorter and of a lighter nature. (See the history of pasquinade, under the definition. See also satire.) An invective is a verbal onslaught, generally spoken but possibly written, designed to bring reproach upon another person, present or absent: as, the invectives of Demosthenes against Philip, of Cicero against Verres, of Queen Margaret against Richard (Shak., Rich. III., i. 3). An invective differs from a satire in its intensity and in its lack of reformatory purpose.

lampoon (lam-pön'), v. t. [< lampoon, n.] To abuse in a lampoon; write lampoons against.

It cannot be supposed that the same man who lampooned Plato would spare Pythagoras. Observer, No. 142.

lampooner (lam-pö'nėr), n. One who lampoons or abuses with personal satire; a writer of a lampoon or lampoons.

lampoonry (lam-pön'ri), n. [< lampoon + -ry.] The act of lampooning; written personal abuse or satire. Swift.

lamporst, n. [MD. lampers, D. lamfer: see lampas[3].] A sort of thin silk.

Before the stoole of estate satt another mayde, all clothyd in white, and her face coveryd with white lampors.
Letter dated 1559.

lamp-pendant (lamp'pen″dant), n. A hanging frame or grating, or luster-shaped structure, arranged for holding one or more lamps.

lamp-plug (lamp'plug), n. In Great Britain, a cylindrical piece of wood secured to a lamp-case by a chain, and used to fill the lamp-aperture in a roof when the lamp is not in place. Car-Builder's Dict.

lamp-protector (lamp'prō-tek″tor), n. In Great Britain, a sheet-iron cover hinged to a lamp-case and secured by a spring-catch, to protect the lamp from rain, while allowing the smoke to escape. The American equivalent is lamp-jack. Car-Builder's Dict.

lamp-pruner (lamp'prö″nėr), n. An implement for cleaning and picking the wicks of a lamp.

lampreel† (lam-prēl'), n. [A contr. of lamper-eel: see lamprey.] A lamper-eel or lamprey.

Lampreels that ingender with snakes, and are full of eyes on both sides. Marston and Webster, Malcontent, i. 5.

lamprel† (lam'prel), n. A lamprey in a certain stage of growth. See quotation under lamprey.

lampret† (lam'pret), n. [See lamprey.] A lamprey in a certain stage of growth. See quotation under lamprey.

lamprey (lam'pri), n. [Also in variant or deriv. forms lamper, lampern, lampron, lampret, lamprel, etc.; < ME. lampreie, < OF. lampreie, lamproie*, F. lamproie = Pr. lamprada = Sp. Pg. lam- a nest of stones, which are collected by means of the suctorial mouth. The species, about 20 in number, are mostly inhabitants of the temperate regions of the northern and southern hemispheres, and constitute the order Hyperoartia and family Petromyzontidæ, divided into from 4 to 8 genera. The largest is the sea-lamprey, Petromyzon marinus, sometimes attaining a length of about 3 feet. The best-known species of the northern hemisphere belong to the genera Petromyzon and Lampetra or Ammocœtes, as the river-lamprey, or lampern, and the pride. See also cut under basket.

Randle Holme (1688), p. 325.

Lamprididæ (lam-prid'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lampris (Lamprid-) + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes constituted for the genus Lampris, of compressed oval form, with long dorsal and anal fins, and with subabdominal ventrals having numerous rays. It contains the opah.

Lampris (lam'pris), n. [NL., < Gr. λαμπρός, shining, bright, brilliant, radiant, < λάμπειν, shine: see lamp[1].] The typical genus of Lamprididæ, containing one known species, of large size and resplendent colors, inhabiting the open sea — L. luna, the opah.

Lamprocolius (lam-prō-kō'li-us), n. [NL., < Gr. λαμπρός, bright, + κολιός, a woodpecker.] A genus of splendid African starlings of the subfamily Juidinæ. Also called Lamprotornis. Sundevall, 1836.

lampron (lam'prǫn), n. [Also lampurn; < ME. lampron, lamprun, laumpron, laumprun, < OF. lampron, lampreon, lamproyon, lamprion, dim. of lampreie, lamprey: see lamprey.] A lamprey. [Obsolete or provincial.]

As if thou woldest an eel or a laumprun holde withe streite hondis, hou myche strengerli thou thristis, so myche the sunnere it shal gliden away.
Wyclif, Prologue to Job.

lamprophyre (lam'prǫ-fīr), n. [< Gr. λαμπρός, bright, + (πορ)φύρεος, purple: see porphyry.] The name given by Gümbel to rocks, considerably varied in lithological character, occurring in dikes in strata of Paleozoic age. Under the name lamprophyre were included rocks resembling minette, kersantite, and mica-diabase in character, but grouped under one name for convenience of geological description. Rosenbusch divides the lamprophyres into two groups, the syenitic and the dioritic: in the former the dominant feldspar is orthoclase; in the latter, plagioclase.

lamprophyric (lam-prǫ-fir'ik), a. [< lamprophyr(e) + -ic.] Of or pertaining to lamprophyre.

Lamprosoma (lam-prǫ-sō'mä), n. [NL. (Kirby, 1818), < Gr. λαμπρός, shining, + σῶμα, body.] 1. In entom., a large and important genus of leaf-beetles or Chrysomelidæ, having the tarsal claws appendiculate. It is confined to tropical America, and comprises nearly 100 nominal species, the various forms of the genus being extremely difficult to determine. 2†. In herpet., a genus of colubriform serpents, now called Chionactis. Hallowell, 1857.

Lamprotes (lam'prǫ-tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. λαμπρότης, brightness, < λαμπρός, bright: see Lampris.] 1. A genus of hymenopterous parasites of the family Chalcididæ. Walker, 1829. — 2. The typical genus of tanagers of the subfamily Lamprotinæ, having long sharp claws and glossy black plumage. W. Swainson, 1837. — 3. A genus of tineid moths of the family Gelechiidæ, based upon certain European species formerly included in Gelechia. Heinemann, 1870.

Lamprotinæ (lam-prǫ-tī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Lamprotes, 2, + -inæ.] A subfamily of Tanagridæ, represented by the genera Lamprotes and Sericossypha. P. L. Sclater.

Lamprotornis (lam-prǫ-tôr'nis), n. [NL., < NL. Lamprotes + Gr. ὄρνις (ὀρνιθ-), bird.] 1. A genus of Papuan manucodes or paradise-birds: same as Astrapia. Temminck, 1820. — 2. Same as Lamprocolius. W. Swainson, 1837.

Lamprotornithinæ (lam-prǫ-tôr-ni-thī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Lamprotornis + -inæ.] A subfamily of splendid sturnoid passerine birds, of the family Sturnidæ, typified by the genus Lamprotornis (def. 2), including the African glossy starlings and their relatives. The genus name not being available in this connection, the subfamily was by G. R. Gray in 1855 named Juidinæ. Also Lamprotorninæ (Swainson, 1837).

lamprotype (lam'prǫ-tīp), n. [< Gr. λαμπρός, bright, + τύπος, impression.] In photog., a paper print glazed with collodion and gelatin.

Lampsacene (lamp'sạ-sēn), a. [< L. Lampsacenus, of Lampsacus, < Lampsacus, Lampsacum, < Gr. Λάμψακος, a city of Mysia, on the Hellespont, now represented in name by a village called Lamsaki.] Of or pertaining to Lampsacus, the reputed birthplace of Priapus; hence, Priapic: especially used with reference to classical drama, symbolism, etc.

Lampsana (lamp'sạ-nä), n. See Lapsana.

Lampsaneæ (lamp-sā'nē-ē), n. pl. See Lapsaneæ.

lamp-shade (lamp'shād), n. A shade or screen placed above or around the flame of a lamp, to intercept, modify, or reflect the light. It may be opaque, or have a dark exterior and a reflecting interior surface so disposed as to throw the light downward or in any other direction desired. Lamp-shades are made of glass, tin, porcelain, silk, paper, etc.

lamp-shell (lamp'shel), n. [So called in allusion to the resemblance of the shell at one end to an ancient lamp with the wick.] A brachiopod of the family Terebratulidæ or some related family; by extension, any brachiopod. See lampas[2].

lamp-stand (lamp'stand), n. An upright standard with a broad base, serving to hold one or more lamps.

lamp-stove (lamp'stōv), n. A small stove in which heat is generated by the combustion of oil through the agency of wicks, as in a lamp. See oil-stove.

lampurn†, n. See lampron.

lampus, n. See lampas[2], 1.

lamp-wick (lamp'wik), n. 1. The wick of a lamp. — 2. A cultivated labiate plant, Phlomis Lychnites, native in southern Europe. Its leaves are said to have been used as lamp-wicks, whence this and the specific name. [In this sense properly lampwick.]

Lampyridæ (lam-pir'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lampyris + -idæ.] A family of serricorn malacodermatous pentamerous beetles with 7 or 8 ventral segments (of which the first is not elongate), the prominent hind coxæ not sulcate, the front coxæ with trochantin, and the tarsi slender. The body is usually lengthened and has flexible elytra, though elytra are sometimes wanting. There are more than 500 species, mostly American. Many are phosphorescent, and are known as glow-worms, fireflies, lightning-bugs, etc. The family is divisible into Telephorinæ, Lampyrinæ, and Lycinæ.

Lampyrinæ (lam-pi-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Lampyris + -inæ.] The typical subfamily of Lampyridæ, having the mesothoracic episterna sinuate and the epipleuræ usually wide at the base. The group is noted for the luminosity of most of its species. See firefly, lightning-bug, and glow-worm.

lampyrine (lam'pi-rin), a. and n. [< Lampyris + -ine[1].] I. a. Luminous, as a firefly; of or pertaining to the Lampyrinæ.

II. n. A member of the Lampyrinæ.

Lampyris (lam'pi-ris), n. [NL., < L. lampyris, < Gr. λαμπυρίς, also, and more prop., λάμπουρις, a glow-worm (also a fox), < λάμπουρος, having a bright tail, < λάμπειν, shine, + οὐρά, tail. Cf. equiv. πυγολαμπίς, < πυγή, rump, + λάμπειν, shine; and πυριλαμπίς, < πῦρ, = E. fire, + λάμπειν, shine.] The typical genus of the family Lampyridæ. L. noctiluca and L. splendidula are common European fireflies, the females of which are wingless, with soft, jointed, worm-like body, and are hence termed glow-worms. These and the larvæ are luminous.

Lampyris noctiluca.

lamy (lā'mi), n.; pl. lamies (-miz). [Hebrides.] The common murre or guillemot, Lomvia troile.

★C. Swainson. Also lavy.

lana (lä'nä), n. [S. Amer.] A close-grained and tough wood obtained from Genipa Americana, a South American and West Indian tree belonging to the family Rubiaceæ. The fruit, called genipap, yields a pigment called lana-dye, which the Indians use to stain their faces and persons. See Genipa and genipap.

lanarkite (lan'ạr-kīt), n. [< Lanark (see def.) + -ite[2].] A basic sulphate of lead occurring in greenish-white or pale-yellow monoclinic crystals at Leadhills in Lanarkshire, Scotland.

lanary (lā'nạ-ri), n.; pl. lanaries (-riz). [< L. lanaria, a wool-factory, fem. of lanarius, belonging to wool, < lana, wool: see lanate.] A place for storing wool. Bailey, 1727. [Obsolete or rare.]

lanate (lā'nāt), a. [< L. lanatus, woolly, < lana = Gr. λῆνος, wool.] Woolly; covered with a substance resembling wool, as an animal, or the leaf or stem of a plant.

lanated (lā'nā-ted), a. [< lanate + -ed[2].] Same as lanate.

Lancaster black-drop. See black-drop.

Lancasterian (lang-kas-tē'ri-an), a. [< Lancaster (see def.) + -ian.] Of or pertaining to Joseph Lancaster, an English schoolmaster (1778–1838), or the method of monitorial instruction in primary schools established by him: as, the Lancasterian system; Lancasterian schools. The principal feature of the system was the teaching of the younger pupils by the more advanced, called monitors; hence the terms monitorial and (incorrectly) mutual-instruction system, sometimes used as equivalents.

Lancastrian (lang-kas'tri-an), a. and n. [< Lancaster (see def.) + -ian.] I. a. In Eng. hist., of or pertaining to the dukes or the royal house of Lancaster. The Lancastrian kings, descendants of John of Gaunt, fourth son of Edward III. and first duke of Lancaster, were Henry IV., V., and VI., 1399–1461; and the Lancastrian party finally triumphed under their indirect representative Henry VII., the first of the Tudors, 1485–1509. See II.

If this fayre rose offend thy sight,
Placed in thy bosom bare,
'T will blush to find itself less white,
And turn Lancastrian there.
The White Rose.

II. n. In Eng. hist., an adherent of the house of Lancaster; a supporter of the claims to the crown of the Lancastrian line, as against the Yorkists, especially in the contests called the wars of the Roses (which see, under rose), ★1455–85.

lance[1] (lans), n. [Early mod. E. also launce; < ME. launce (= D. lans = G. lanze = Dan. landse = Sw. lans), < OF. lance, F. lance = Pr. lansa = Sp. lanza = Pg. lança = It. lancia, < L. lancea, appar. = Gr. λόγχη, a light spear. The L. word was said to be of Spanish (Hispanic) origin.] 1. A long spear used rather by couching and in the charge than for throwing; especially, the long spear of the middle ages, and of certain modern cavalry regiments in which the use of this arm is retained. The war-lance of the fourteenth century was about 16 feet long; that of modern times is from 8½ to 11 feet. A small flag is usually attached to the shaft of the lance near the head.

At the turnynge that tyme the traytours hym hitte . . .
That the boustous launce the bewelles attamede,
That braste at the brawlyng, and brake in the myddys.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 2175.

My good blade carves the casques of men,
My tough lance thrusteth sure.
Tennyson, Sir Galahad.

2. Any long and slender spear: applied loosely to weapons of savage tribes, etc. — 3. The instrument with which a whale is killed after being harpooned and tired out. Two kinds are used, the hand-lance and the bomb-lance, the latter being the more effectual. A boat's outfit usually includes three hand-lances.

4. In carp., a pointed blade, as that affixed to one side of a chipping-bit or router to sever the grain around the path of the tool. It is also used in certain crozes, gages, and planes. E. H. Knight.—5. A pyrotechnic squib used for various purposes.—6. An iron rod which is fixed across the earthen mold of a shell, and keeps it suspended in the air when the shell is cast. As soon as the shell is formed, this rod must be taken out with instruments made for that purpose. Wilhelm, Mil. Dict.

7. One skilled in the use of the lance; a soldier armed with a lance; a lancer.

Duke Dudley was unquestionably the ablest public man of the age. In youth the most graceful lance in the tilt-yards of Greenwich and Windsor, the bravest soldier of the later wars of Henry, the mainstay of the Revolution after Henry's death. R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., xxi.

With his prepared sword, he charges home
My unprovided body, lanced mine arm.
Shak., Lear, ii. 1. 54.

Seized the due victim, and with fury lanced
Her back. Dryden, Theodore and Honoria, l. 301.

2. To open with or as if with a lancet: as, to lance an abscess.

It is an age, indeed, which is only fit for satire, and the sharpest I have shall never be wanting to lance its villanies, and its ingratitude to the government.
Dryden, Ded. of Plutarch's Lives.

The favorite remedy for all disorders occurring at the time of dentition is lancing the gums.
Quain, Med. Dict., p. 342.

3†. To throw in the manner of a javelin; launch.

Oure lorde to the lede lansed a speche:
"Is this ryȝt-wys thou renk, alle thy ronk noyse?"
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), iii. 489.

Deep in the Glebe her Spear she lanc'd.
Congreve, Pindaric Odes, ii.

4†. To shoot forth as a lance.

"The tree hihte Trewe-loue," quath he, "the trinite hit sette;

Piers Plowman (C), xix. 10.

II.† intrans. 1. To shoot or spring up.

And thorw the grete grace of God of greyn ded in erthe Atte laste launceth vp wher-by we lyuen alle.
Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 185.

2. To pierce.

The swerd of loue thorw hire [Mary] gan launce, Heo swapte on swownying thorw that chaunce.
Holy Rood (E. E. T. S.), p. 142.

lance[2]† (lâns), n. [Also written launce; = OIt. lance, < L. lanx (acc. lanc-), a plate, platter, scale of a balance: see balance. Cf. auncel.] A balance.

Need teacheth her this lesson hard and rare,
That fortune all in equall launce doth sway.
Spenser, F. Q., III. vii. 4.

lance-bucket (lâns'buk″et), n. A shoe or rest to support the butt of the lance, forming part of the accoutrements of certain bodies of lancers.

lance-corporal (lâns'kôr″pō-ral), n. Milit., a private performing the duties of a corporal, with temporary rank as such.

lance-fly (lâns'flī), n. A poetical name of some undetermined insect, perhaps a lace-fly.

At the glimpse of morning pale
The lance-fly spreads his silken sail.
J. R. Drake, Culprit Fay.

lancegay†, n. [Also erroneously lance-de-gay; < ME. lancegay, launcegay, < OF. lancegaie, lancegaye, launcegaie, for lance-zagaye*, < lance, lance, + zagaye, assagai: see assagai.] A kind of spear or javelin.

In his hand a launcegay,
A long swerd by his syde.
Chaucer, Sir Thopas, l. 41.

But with a shotte off a launcegay tho
Thys noble knyght smetyn thorugh hys body.
Rom. of Partenay (E. E. T. S.), l. 2108.

These carried a kind of lance de gay, sharp at both ends, which they held in the midst of the staff.
Raleigh, Hist. World, v. 3.

★ lance-head (lâns'hed), n. The head of a lance. The typical lance-head is that used in the fourteenth century, and is almost as straight and uniform as a bayonet. The lance-head is usually fastened to the wood by one or more tangs on the outside; but sometimes these nearly envelop the wood, forming a sort of ferrule.

lance-hook (lâns'hůk), n. A small iron hook on the side of a whale-boat, designed to hold a lance.

lance-knight† (lâns'nīt), n. [An erroneously accom. form, as if a soldier armed with a lance, of landsknecht, lanzknecht.] A common foot-soldier.

At one time there came an army of eighteen thousand foot, at another time an army wherein were reckoned twelve thousand launce-knights.
Baker, Hen. VIII., an. 1546.

land[1] (land), n. [< ME. land, lond, < AS. land, ★lond = OS. OFries. D. MLG. LG. land, OHG. MHG. lant, land, G. Icel. Dan. Sw. Goth. land, land, country. There are no appar. connections outside of Teut. The F. lande, a heath, etc., is perhaps of other origin: see land[3], launde[1].] 1. The solid substance of the earth's surface; any part of the continuous surface of the solid materials constituting the body of the globe: as, dry or submerged land; mountain or desert land.

The barrez of vche a bonk ful bigly me haldes
That I may lachche no lont.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), iii. 322.

God said, Let . . . the dry land appear: and it was so. And God called the dry land Earth. Gen. i. 9, 10.

2. The exposed part of the earth's surface, as distinguished from the submerged part; dry or solid ground: as, to travel by land and water; to spy land from the masthead.

Ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte.
Mat. xxiii. 15.

3. A part of the earth's surface distinguished in any way from other parts; a country, division, or tract considered as the home of a person or a people, or marked off by ethnical, physical, or moral characteristics: as, one's native land; the land of the midnight sun; the land of the citron and myrtle.

Engelond ys a wel god lond, ich wene of eche lond best, Y set in the ende of the world, as al in the West.
Rob. of Gloucester, p. 1.

Breathes there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!
Scott, L. of L. M., vi. 1.

A land of hops and poppy-mingled corn,
Little about it stirring save a brook.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

4†. The country; the rural regions; in general, distant regions.

To here hem synge . . .
In swete accord, "my lief is faren on londe."
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 59.

5. Ground considered as a subject of use or possession; earth; soil. In law, land signifies any ground forming part of the earth's surface which can be held as individual property, whether soil or rock, or water-covered, and everything annexed to it, whether by nature, as trees, water, etc., or by the hand of man, as buildings, fences, etc. In contemplation of law the fee simple in land includes a right of an indefinite extent upward as well as downward toward the center of the earth.

For no londes, but for loue, loke ze be wedded.
Piers Plowman (B), ix. 175.

Thy lands and goods
Are, by the laws of Venice, confiscate.
Shak., M. of V., iv. 1. 310.

6†. A strip of land left unbroken in a plowed field; the space between two furrows.

Faith on hym hadde furst a sight, ac he fleih a-syde,
And wolde not neyhle [nigh] him by nyne londes lengthe.
Piers Plowman (C), xx. 58.

Another [groom] who had a box, wherein was money, apparell, and other things of value, left it in a land of standing corne.
Apprehension of Cavalliers at Brackley in Northamptonshire [(1642), p. 7. (Davies.)

Hence—7. (a) That part of the inner surface of a rifle which lies between the grooves. After a rifle has been smooth-bored to the prescribed diameter the grooves are cut out by a special tool which gives them the proper width, depth, and twist. The parts of the bore which remain are called lands and are joined to the grooves by proper fillets.

(b) In a millstone, the plane surface between two furrows. (c) The smooth uncut part of the face-plate of a slide-valve in a steam-engine. (d) The lap of the strakes in a clincher-built boat. Also called landing. E. H. Knight.—8. In some cities in Scotland, a group of separate dwellings under one roof and having a common entry; a dwelling-house divided into tenements for different families, each tenement being called a house, and the whole a land, or a land of houses.

The houses were piled to an enormous height, some of them amounting to twelve storeys. These were denominated lands.
Arnot, Hist. Edinburgh, p. 241. (Jamieson.) land-drake (land′drāk), n. Same as land-crake. [Prov. Eng.]

lande (land), n. [< F. lande = Sp. Pg. It. landa, a heath, a waste: see laund[1], which is from the OF. form of the same word, and is now in use only in the form lawn[1].] An uncultivated plain, or level region, covered with a spontaneous growth of heath, broom, and ferns; any unfertile level region or tract in which the soil is tilled with difficulty. "The Landes" is the name given especially to a region lying along the ocean, north of the Pyrenees, which was once a part of the bed of the sea, and is covered with sands of Pliocene age. These sands have in many places, at an inconsiderable depth beneath the surface, become compacted into beds of hard sandstone, called alios. The word lande is used by writers in English only with reference to the geography of France, and especially to the region included in the department of the Gironde and in that named from this word Les Landes. This region bears naturally little but heath and broom, but on the seaward side has been extensively planted with sea-pines, which at once hold the sands in place and provide an important store of timber. The inland plains are generally occupied as sheep-runs. The Landes are dry in summer and marshy in winter.

landed (lan′ded), a. [< ME. landed, londed; < land[1] + -ed[2].] 1. Having possessions in land: as, the landed gentry; a landed proprietor.

land-grabber (land′grab″ėr), n. 1. One who grabs or seizes land; one who gets possession of another's land by trick or device, or by force; especially, one who possesses himself of public land by means contrary to the spirit of the law; one who seizes large tracts of land rapaciously and unfairly.—2. Specifically, in Ireland, one who buys or rents land from which another has been evicted.

Right or wrong, the attitude of the League to the landgrabber is that which, in the old days of regrating, the English public would have assumed towards one who, while the whole community was trying to bring down the price of corn, went and purchased at the rate which by universal consent had been ruled to be excessive.
Contemporary Rev., LI. 238.

land-grabbing (land′grab″ing), n. The act or practice of seizing or occupying land by unlawful or dishonorable means.

landgrave (land′grāv), n. [= D. landgraaf = Dan. landgreve = MLG. landgrave = MHG. lantgrāve, G. landgraf; as land[1] + grave[5].] In Germany, in the middle ages, a graf or count to whom were intrusted special judicial functions, extending over a considerable territory; later, the title of certain German princes, some of whom were princes of the empire. The branches of the non-regnant families of Hesse possess the title of landgrave, which is borne by the head of each branch.

This was the origin of the landgraves of Thuringia, of Lower and Higher Alsace, the only three who were princes of the empire. Brande and Cox.

landgraviate (land-grā′vi-āt), n. [< landgrave + -i-ate[3].] The territory held by a landgrave, or his office, jurisdiction, or authority.

landless (land′les), a. [< ME. landles*, < AS. landleás (= MLG. lantlōs = MHG. landelōs), without land, < land, land, + -leás, -less.] Destitute of land; having no property in land.

Now, sir, young Fortinbras . . .
Hath in the skirts of Norway, here and there,
Shark'd up a list of landless resolutes.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 1. 98.

Allegiance is the duty which each man of the nation owes to the head of the nation, whether the man be a landowner or landless. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 462.

landlocked (land′lokt), a. 1. Almost shut in by land; protected by surrounding land from the full force of the wind and waves: as, a landlocked harbor.

Many a wide-lapped port and land-locked bay.
Whittier, The Panorama.

Few sights are more striking than to see the huge mass of the amphitheatre at Pola seeming to rise at once out of the land-locked sea. E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 112.

2. Living in landlocked waters, or in any way shut off from the sea: as, a landlocked salmon.

landloper (land′lō″pėr), n. [Also landlouper; a var. of landleaper (cf. lope, loup, var. of leap[1]), due in part to D. landlooper = MLG. lantloper = MHG. lantlouføre, lantloufer, lantleufer, G. landläufer = Dan. landlöber, vagabond, = E. landleaper.] One who wanders about the country: same as landleaper.

He [Perkin Warbeck] had been from his childhood such a wanderer, or, as the king called him, such a landloper.
Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII.

Such Travellers as these may bee termed Landlopers, as the Dutchman saith, rather than Travellers.
Howell, Forraine Travell (reprint, 1869), p. 67.

You are known
For Osbeck's son of Tournay, a loose runagate,
A landloper. Ford, Perkin Warbeck, v. 3.

A crowd of spectators, landlopers, mendicants, daily aggregated themselves to the aristocratic assembly.
Motley, Dutch Republic, I. 546.

landloping (land′lō″ping), a. Wandering; roving; vagrant.

It is nothing strange that these his landloping legats and nuncios haue their manifold collusions to cousen christian kingdoms of their reuenues.
Holinshed, Hen. III., an. 1244.

landlord (land′lôrd), n. [< ME. londelorde, landloverd*, < AS. landhlāford, the owner of land, lord of a manor, also (poet.) the lord or ruler of a country, < land, land, + hlāford, lord: see lord.] 1. The lord of land or of a manor; one of whom land is held subject to the payment or performance of rent or service; the owner or holder of a tenement, to whom the tenant pays rent.

Wert thou regent of the world,
It were a shame to let this land by lease. . . .
Landlord of England art thou now, not king.
Shak., Rich. II., ii. 1. 113.

2. The master or proprietor of an inn, or of a lodging-house or boarding-house; a host.—Landlord and Tenant Act, a British statute of 1870, also known as the Land Act, or Irish Land Act (33 and 34 Vict., c. 46), regulating the relation of landlord and tenant in Ireland, and containing provisions intended to facilitate the creation of a peasant proprietary by allowing tenants to purchase their holdings.

landlordism (land′lôrd-izm), n. [< landlord + -ism.] Action or opinion characteristic of landlords; the authority exercised by landlords; the doctrine or principle of the supremacy of the landed interest.

But in Ireland there would be a very serious danger of a landlordism far worse than that at present existing, if every petty proprietor should have power to become a petty landlord. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 713.

landlordry† (land′lôrd-ri), n. [< landlord + -ry.] The state or condition of a landlord; landlords collectively.

Such pilfering slips of petty landlordry.
Bp. Hall, Satires, v. 1.

landlouper, landlouping (land′lou″pėr, -lou″ping). Scotch or northern English forms of landloper, landloping.

landlubber (land′lub″ėr), n. A person who, from want of experience, is awkward or lubberly on board ship; a raw seaman; any one unused to the sea: a term of reproach or ridicule among sailors.

landlubberly (land′lub″ėr-li), a. [< landlubber + -ly[1].] Having the ways of a landlubber; awkward on board ship from lack of experience.

land-lurch† (land′lėrch), v. t. To steal land from.

Hence countrie loutes land-lurch their lords.
Warner, Albion's England, ix. 46.

landmale† (land′māl), n. [< land + male[2] = mail[2].] A reserved rent or annual sum of money charged upon a piece of land by the chief lord of the fee or a subsequent mesne owner. Halliwell.

landman (land′man), n.; pl. landmen (-men). [< ME. landman, < AS. landmann (= D. landman = MHG. lantman, G. landmann, a native of the country, = Dan. landmand, a farmer), < land, land, country, + mann, man.] 1. A man who lives or serves on land: opposed to seaman.—2. In Eng. law, a tenant or occupant of land; a terre-tenant.—3. A farmer or countryman. [Scotch.]—4. A landowner. [Scotch.]

Bot kirk-mennis cursit substance semis sweet Till land-men, with that leud burd-lyme are kyttit.
Bannatyne, Poems, p. 199.

landmark (land′märk), n. [< ME. landmark*, < AS. landmearc, also land-gemirce, land-gemyrce (= Dan. landemærke), the boundary of a country, < land, land, + mearc, mark: see mark[1].] 1. A boundary-mark to a tract of land; one of the fixed objects used to designate the limits of a farm, town, or other piece of territory, as monumental stones, marked trees, or ditches.

Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark.
Deut. xix. 14.

Virtues and vices have not, in all their instances, a great landmark set between them, like warlike nations separate by prodigious walls, vast seas, and portentous hills.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), II. 9.

2. Any specific or prominent object marking a locality or historically associated with a locality; a hill, tree, house, or other feature of a landscape that may serve as a guide; especially, some object on land by which a locality may be recognized by persons at sea.

There are no landmarks in space; one portion of space is exactly like every other portion, so that we cannot tell where we are. Clerk Maxwell, Matter and Motion, art. iii.

The gray mass of building crowning the little promontory is the only landmark seen above the green garden-land. B. Taylor, Lands of the Saracen, p. 48.

3. Figuratively, a distinguishing characteristic, variation, or event; that which marks a turning-point; something that serves to distinguish a particular period of time or point in progress or transition: as, the landmarks of science or history.

The close of the Crimean War is a great landmark in the reign of Queen Victoria.
J. McCarthy, Hist. Own Times, xxix.

★land-marker (land′märˈkėr), n. An attachment to a plow or other implement to mark out the planting row; a field-marker.

land-mate†, n. One who in harvest-time reaps with another on the same ridge of ground or land. Blount. [Prov. Eng.] land-measure (land′mezh″ūr), n. 1. Measurement of land.—2. A denomination of square measure used in the mensuration of land. Land-measures are either squares of linear units, as the are; or are fixed from the amount which can be plowed or otherwise attended to in a day, as the acre; or from the amount necessary to sow a measure of seed, as the cahizada; or from the amount of yield, as the misura; or from the amount necessary for a house or farm, as the quarter-section. The table of ordinary English land-measures (used also in the United States and the British colonies) is as follows:

Acre.	Roods.	Square Perches.	Square Yards.	Square Feet.	Square Meters.
1 =	4 =	160 =	4840 =	43560 =	4046.9
	1 =	40 =	1210 =	10890 =	1011.7
		1 =	30¼ =	272¼ =	25.29
			1 =	9 =	0.8361

land-measurer (land′mezh″ūr-ėr), n. A person whose employment is to ascertain by measurement and computation the superficial extent of portions of land, as fields, farms, etc.

land-measuring (land′mezh″ūr-ing), n. The art of determining by measurement and computation the superficial contents of pieces of land in acres, roods, etc. It is properly a subordinate branch of land-surveying, but the terms are sometimes used synonymously. It depends upon the formula for the area of a triangle in terms of its three sides, a, b, c, which is land-otter (land′ot″ėr), n. Any ordinary otter of the subfamily Lutrinæ, inhabiting rivers and lakes, as distinguished from the sea-otter, Enhydris marina.

$$\tfrac{1}{4}\sqrt{(a+b+c)(a+b-c)(b+c-a)(c+a-b)}.$$

★land-office (land′of″is), n. See land office, under land[1].

Landolphia (lan-dol′fi-ä), n. [NL.: after Capt. Landolphe, who commanded the expedition to Oware (Wari? Guinea), where the plants were discovered.] A name given by Palisot de Beauvois in 1806 to Pacouria, a genus of tropical old world climbing shrubs, of the family Apocynaceæ. The stamens are inserted near the base of the corolla-tube; the corolla-lobes are narrow; the fruit is a large berry; the leaves are opposite and veiny; the flowers are generally large and white or yellowish, in terminal cymes; and the peduncles are produced into tendrils. Sixteen species have been reported from tropical and subtropical South Africa and Madagascar, possibly one from Guiana. Pacouria florida (Landolphia florida of Bentham) produces Mbungu rubber and P. Kirkii (Landolphia Kirkii of Dyer) Matere rubber. See aboli and india-rubber.

landowner (land′ō″nėr), n. An owner or proprietor of land.

landownership (land′ō″nėr-ship), n. [< landowner + -ship.] The state of being an owner of land; proprietorship of land.

But throughout France diversities of climate, landownership, and land tenure have left their mark.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXVI. 280.

land-owning (land′ō″ning), a. Holding or possessing landed estates; pertaining to landowners: as, the land-owning class.

land-parer (land′pār″ėr), n. A form of plow used to cut sods and turfs at a fixed depth below the surface. E. H. Knight.

land-pike (land′pīk), n. An American urodele batrachian, as a menopome, hellbender, or axolotl; one of the creatures commonly described as "fish with legs." See cut under hellbender.

land-pilot (land′pī′lot), n. A guide in a journey by land. [Rare.]

To find out that, good shepherd, I suppose,
In such a scant allowance of star-light,
Would overtask the best land-pilot's art.
Milton, Comus, l. 309.

land-pirate (land′pī″rāt), n. 1. A highway robber.—2. One of a class of men in seaports who live by cheating or robbing sailors.

land-plaster (land′plās″tėr), n. Rock-gypsum ground to a powder for use as a fertilizer.

land-poor (land′pör), a. Poor or in need of ready money while owning or holding much unremunerative land; especially, poor because of the taxes and other maintenance charges against such land.

land-rail (land′rāl), n. The corn-crake, Crex pratensis: distinguished from water-rail.

land-raker†, n. A vagabond; a landloper.

I am joined with no foot land-rakers, no long-staff, six-penny strikers. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 81.

landreeve (land′rēv), n. A subordinate officer on an estate who acts as an assistant to the land-steward.

land-rent (land′rent), n. Payment for the use of land.

land-roll (land′rōl), n. In agri., a heavy roller used for crushing clods and rendering the earth friable and smooth; a clod-crusher.

Landry's paralysis. See paralysis.

landscape (land′skāp), n. [An altered form of the earlier landskip (rarely lantschip, after the D. form; no ME. form landship* appears); AS. landscipe, also landsceap (= OS. landskepi = D. landschap = MLG. lantschop = OHG. lantscaf, lantscaft, MHG. lantschaft, G. landschaft = Icel. landskapr, landsskapr = Sw. landskap = Dan. landskab, a region, district, a province, in D. also landscape, whence the mod. E. sense and form), < land, land, + -scipe = E. -ship: see land[1] and -ship. The change was appar. due to artistic associations with Holland in the 17th century.] 1. A view or prospect of rural scenery, more or less extensive, such as is comprehended within the scope or range of vision from a single point of view. See also landskip.

These Pictures shew, that the Antients understood Perspective and Landschape.
Hoare, Phil. Trans., XLIV. 570.

2. A picture representing a view or prospect of rural or natural inland scenery as it appears within the range of vision from a single point of view; also, such pictures collectively, as distinguished especially from marine and architectural pictures and from portraits.—3†. A compendious view or manifestation; an epitome; a compend.

That landscape of iniquity, that sink of sin, and that compendium of baseness, who now calls himself our Protector.
Address sent by the Anabaptists to the King (1658), in Clarendon's Great Rebellion, xv.

Landscape-gardening, the art of laying out grounds and arranging trees, shrubbery, borders, paths, fountains, etc., so as to produce picturesque effects.—Landscape-painter, a painter of landscapes or rural scenery.—Landscape-painting, the art of representing natural scenery by painting.—Syn. 1. Prospect, Scene, etc. See view, n.

landscape (land'skāp), v. t.; pret. and pp. landscaped, ppr. landscaping. [< landscape, n.] To represent or delineate in landscape. [Rare.]

As weary traveller that climbs a hill,
Looks back, sits down, and oft, if hand have skill, Landscapes the vale with pencil.
Holyday, Service of the World, Pref.

landscape-mirror (land'skāp-mir″ọr), n. In art, a mirror used to condense a landscape or view, and thus facilitate its presentation in perspective; a Claude Lorrain glass.

landscapist (land'skā-pist), n. [< landscape + -ist.] A landscape-painter.

The work of the landscapist is to convey a speedy impression to the onlooker of some beautiful or truthful natural scene. W. Sharp, D. G. Rossetti, p. 57.

land-scrip (land'skrip), n. In the United States, negotiable paper issued by government, in pursuance of legislative donations, to individuals, companies, or communities, in reward for public services, or for the promotion of education or useful enterprises, entitling the holders to the possession of specified quantities of public land; also, similar paper issued by corporate bodies holding such donations.

land-scurvy (land'skėr″vi), n. See scurvy.

land-shark (land'shärk), n. 1. A person who subsists by cheating or robbing sailors on shore; a land-pirate.

Can't trust these landsharks; they'll plunder even the rings off a corpse's fingers. Kingsley, Two Years Ago, iv.

2. A land-grabber; one who seizes upon land by force or chicanery.

There will be evasion of our [land] laws by native and foreign land-sharks. The American, VIII. 68.

land-shell (land'shel), n. A shell of a terrestrial mollusk, as of any pulmonate gastropod.

landshut (land'shut), n. A land-flood. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.] land-sick (land'sik), a. 1. Sick for sight of the land.—2. Affected by proximity to land, as a ship; not moving freely from being too near the land or just released from an anchorage.

A land-sick ship. . . . She knows the land is under the lee, sir, and she won't go any more to windward.
H. Melville, Typee, i.

★ land-side (land'sīd), n. The flat side of a plow, which presses against the unplowed land.

landskip (land'skip), n. Same as landscape. [Obsolete or archaic.]

In this Man's study I was much taken with the draught of a Landskip on a piece of Paper, methoughts Masterly done. Sir H. Wotton, To Lord Bacon, Reliquiæ, p. 300.

Straight mine eye hath caught new pleasures,
Whilst the landskip round it measures.
Milton, L'Allegro, l. 70.

Many a famous man and woman, town
And landskip, have I heard of.
Tennyson, Princess, iv.

landsknecht (länts'knecht), n. See lansquenet.

land-slater (land'slā″tėr), n. A terrestrial isopod; a wood-louse or sowbug. A common land-slater is Oniscus asellus.

land-slide (land'slīd), n. A falling or sliding down of a mass of soil, detritus, or rock on a mountain-side. The less destructive land-slides occur when gravel, sand, and other detrital material resting on a slope become so permeated with water that they can no longer resist the action of gravity. The more destructive land-slides are generally due to the slipping of a part of the solid rock of the mountain, in consequence of the softening of some more permeable layer in a mass of which the strata have a suitable inclination. Some such land-slides have been appalling in their results: as, for instance, that which took place at Plurs, north of Lake Como, in 1618, by which many persons perished, and stately buildings were buried to a depth of 100 feet or more. The falling of part of the eminence called Cape Diamond in Quebec in 1889 destroyed many buildings and many lives. The word land-slip is occasionally used for land-slide, as also the term rock-avalanche. Also called earth-fall.

He will get himself . . . slain by a land-slide, like the agricultural King Onund. Emerson, Eng. Traits, iv.

★ land-slip (land'slip), n. Same as land-slide.

Like some great landslip, tree by tree,
The country-side descended.
Tennyson, Amphion.

landsman (landz'man), n.; pl. landsmen (-men). [= D. landsman = G. landsmann = Dan. landsmand = Sw. landsman; as land's, poss. of land, + man. Cf. landman.] 1. A man of the same land or country; a fellow-countryman. [Rare.]

Stand by me, countryman, . . . for the love of Scotland and Saint Andrew! I am innocent—I am your own native landsman. Scott, Quentin Durward, vi.

2. One who lives on the land; one who has had little or no experience of the sea.

There is not so helpless and pitiable an object in the world as a landsman beginning a sailor's life.
R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 3.

land-snail (land'snāl), n. Any snail of the family Helicidæ.

land-spout (land'spout), n. A heavy fall of water occurring on land, generally during a tornado or thunder-storm, and presenting the appearance of a waterspout.

land-spring (land'spring), n. In England, water lying near the surface, which can easily be reached by shallow wells. The wells become exhausted after a short drought, and after heavy rains sometimes reach the surface and overflow. Hence the name is occasionally applied to intermittent springs, especially such as characterize the chalk districts of England.

All the shallow surface springs, from ten to twenty feet deep, are produced by water which has fallen on and passed through this gravel down to the top of the London clay, on the irregular surface of which it is held up. These are called land-springs, and they constituted, formerly, a principal source of supply to London.
Prestwich, The Water-bearing Strata of London, p. 36.

land-steward (land'stū″ärd), n. A person who has the care of a landed estate.

Landsthing (läns'ting), n. [Dan., < lands, poss. of land, land, + thing, parliament.] The upper house of the Danish Rigsdag or parliament. It consists of 66 members, of whom 12 are appointed for life by the crown, and the others are elected for 8 years, not directly, but by delegates in each of the 54 electoral districts, chosen by those having the necessary property qualification.

landstrait† (land'strāt), n. A narrow strip of land.

landsturm (länt'störm), n. [G., a calling out of the militia, a general call to arms, hence the force so summoned, < land, land, country, + sturm, storm, alarm, = E. storm.] 1. In Germany, Switzerland, etc., a general levy in time of war.—2. The force so called out, or subject to call. In Germany it includes all males between the ages of 17 and 45 who are capable of bearing arms and are not already enrolled or serving in some branch of the army or navy. It is divided into two classes: the first, organized in 293 battalions, comprises all able-bodied men not already in the army or navy up to the age of 39; the second class includes all others up to the age of 45. In Austria the landsturm consists of men who have passed the landwehr and are bound to this service further for 10 years. Men who have served as officers in the regular army or the landwehr are liable for service in the landsturm also up to the age of 60. The armed landsturm of Switzerland includes those (to age 48) who have passed through the auszug and landwehr and all untrained men fit to bear arms. A landsturm is never expected to cross the frontier, and is called on only in cases of emergency.

Landtag (länt'täch), n. [G., < land, land, country, + tag, diet, day, = E. day[1].] In Germany, the legislature of a country; a territorial diet; now, specifically, one of the parliaments of the countries constituting the German empire, as Prussia, Saxony, Bavaria, etc., and of some of the crownlands of Austria-Hungary, as Moravia and Bohemia. See Reichstag.

land-tax (land'taks), n. A tax assessed upon landed property.

land-tie (land'tī), n. A tie-rod used to secure a facing-wall to a bank.

land-tortoise (land'tôr″tis), n. A chelonian of terrestrial habits; a testudine. Also land-turtle.

land-turn (land'tėrn), n. Naut., a land-breeze.

land-turtle (land'tėr″tl), n. A land-tortoise; especially, in the United States, the common box-turtle, Cistudo carolina. See cut under Cistudo.

land-urchin (land'ėr″chin), n. A popular name of the hedgehog: as if opposed to sea-urchin.

land-vine† (land'vīn), n. A native vine. Baret.

land-waiter (land'wā″tėr), n. Same as coast-waiter.

Give a guinea to a knavish land-waiter, and he shall connive at the merchant for cheating the queen of a hundred. Swift, Examiner.

landward, landwards (land'wärd, -wärdz), adv. [= D. landwaarts = MLG. landwert, landewerdes, landwert = G. landwärts = Dan. landverts; as land[1] + -ward, -wards.] Toward the land.

landward (land'wärd), a. [< landward, adv.] 1. Lying toward the land, toward the interior, or away from the sea-coast.

Brown strengthened with sand-bags and earthworks the weak landward bastion of the fort.
N. A. Rev., CXXVI. 80.

2. Situated in, forming part of, or characteristic of the country, as opposed to the town; rural. [Scotch.]

I am wearied wi Mysie's pastry and nonsense—Ye ken landward dainties aye pleased me best, Marion—and landward lasses too. Scott, Bride of Lammermoor, xii.

landwards, adv. See landward.

land-warrant (land'wor″ant), n. In the United States, a transferable government certificate entitling its holder to the possession of a specified quantity of public land.

land-wash (land'wosh), n. The line of high tide along a beach or shore; also, the drift which collects there.

The kegs of kerosene oil . . . were also picked up in the land-wash on the western side of Baccalen island.
Philadelphia Evening Telegraph, XXVII.

landwehr (länt'vār), n. [G. (MHG. lantwer = MLG. lantwere = D. landweer = OFries. landwere; cf. equiv. Icel. landvörn = Sw. landtvärn = Dan. landevœrn), < land, = E. land[1], country, + wehr, defense, < wehren, defend, = AS. werian, defend: see warc[1].] In Germany, Austria, Switzerland, etc., that part of the organized national forces of which continuous service is not required except in time of war. The landwehr corresponds indirectly to the militia of Great Britain and the United States. In Germany it consists of men who have completed seven years' service with the colors and the reserve of the standing army. It is organized, but is not called out in time of peace, unless at intervals for practice. In time of war or other national danger the landwehr is summoned in two levies: first, those from 26 to 32 years old, who take the place of the reserves; second, those from 32 to 39, who are assigned to garrison duty. The time of service in the landwehr is fixed at 5 years in the first levy (3 years for artillery and cavalry), and until the age of 39 in the second levy. The landwehr of Austria comprises those who have served 3 years with the colors and 7 in the reserve, the time of service in the landwehr being fixed at 2 years. The Swiss landwehr comprises all men capable of bearing arms from the age of 32 to 40. The term landwehr is often applied to bodies of militia similarly constituted in other countries: as, the Bulgarian or Servian landwehr.

land-wind (land'wind), n. A wind blowing from the land.

Three days or more seaward he bore,
Then, alas! the land-wind failed.
Longfellow, Sir Humphrey Gilbert.

landworker (land'wėr″kėr), n. One who tills the ground; a farmer or farm-laborer.

Only the tradesworkers and the landworkers are specially considered. F. H. Stoddard, Andover Rev., VIII. 154.

★ lane[1] (lān), n. [< ME. lane, lone, < AS. lane = OFries. lana, lona, East Fries. lone, North Fries. lana, lona, a lane, = MD. laen, D. laan, a lane, alley, avenue; cf. Icel. lön (pl. lanar, mod. lanir), a small oblong hayrick, mod. a row of houses.] 1. A narrow way or passage; a path or passageway between inclosing lines, as of buildings, hedges, fences, trees, or persons; an extended alley.

And whan thei wende haue ben in the streight lane, thei wente oute of her weye, for thei fonde on the lifte side an olde wey that was moche and grene.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 351.

He [Chatham] was then led into the house, . . . all the lords standing up out of respect, and making a lane for him to pass to the earls' bench.
Belsham, Hist. Eng., VI. 350.

The leafy lanes behind the down.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

2. A narrow and well-defined track; a fixed or defined line of passage, as a navigable opening between fields of ice, a fixed course at sea, etc.

How he bestirr'd him! what a lane he made,
And through their fiery bullets thrust securely.
Fletcher (and Massinger?), Lovers' Progress, i. 2.

From the illumined hall
Long lanes of splendour slanted o'er a press
Of snowy shoulders. Tennyson, Princess, iv.

We were . . . driven to shore, and anchored behind some enormous floebergs, where we very patiently watched a large lane of open water, which slowly made from the south after the flowing tide set in.
A. W. Greely, Arctic Service, p. 103.

3. The throat: more usually called the red lane. [Vulgar.]

M. Mumb. And sweete malte maketh ioly good ale for the nones;
Tib Talk. Whiche will slide downe the lane without any bones. Udall, Roister Doister, i. 3.

O butter'd egg, best eaten with a spoon,
I bid your yelk glide down my throat's red lane.
Colmar, Poetical Vagaries, p. 75.

A blind lane, a lane not open at both ends; a cul-de-sac.

Lurking in hernes and in lanes blynde.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 105.

Ocean lane, a fixed route or course of navigation pursued by a vessel or a line of vessels in crossing the ocean, etc.: as, the ocean lane of the Cunard steamers. See lane-route.

lane[2] (lān), a. A dialectal (Scotch) form of lone[1], for alone.—My, thy, his (or him) lane, myself, thyself, himself alone; our, your, their lanes or lane, ourselves, yourse'ves, themselves alone. These usages arose by corruption from the older expressions me lane, him lane. [Scotch.]

I was walking by my lane,
Atween a water and a wa.
The Wee Wee Man (Child's Ballads, I. 126).

lane[3]†, n. A Middle English form of loan[1].

langour†, n. and v. An old form of languor.

langrage†, n. Same as langrel.

langrel†, n. [Also langrage, langridge; origin obscure.] A particular kind of projectile formerly used at sea for tearing sails and rigging, and thus disabling an enemy's ship. It consisted of bolts, nails, and other pieces of iron fastened together.

langret†, n. [Origin obscure.] A die so loaded that certain numbers come up more readily and more frequently than others.

His langrets, with his hie men and his low,
Are ready what his pleasure is to throw.
Rowlands, Humors Ordinarie. (Halliwell.)

First you must know a langret, which is . . . a well favoured die, and seemeth good and square, yet it is forged longer upon the cater and trea than any other way, and therefore it is called a langret.
Art of Juggling (1612), C 4. (Nares.)

langridge†, n. Same as langrel.

langsat (lang'sat), n. See lansa.

Langsdorffia (langz-dôr'fi-ä), n. [NL. (Martius, 1818), named after G. H. von Langsdorff, who traveled in South America and encouraged scientific research in Brazil.] A genus of archichlamydeous plants belonging to the family Balanophoraceæ, and type of the tribe Langsdorffieæ. It has diœcious or monœcious flowers, the perianth in the male flowers with 3 valvate lobes, the female flowers grown together below. These plants are thick, yellow, waxy herbs with purplish scales and flowers. The only species, L. hypogæa, is a native of tropical South America.

Langsdorffieæ (langz-dôr-fī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Schott and Endlicher, 1832), < Langsdorffia + -eæ.] A tribe of the family Balanophoraceæ, consisting of the two genera Langsdorffia and Thonningia, characterized by diœcious or monœcious flowers, in which the perianth of the male flowers is 3-lobed or consists of 2 or 3 scales, and that of the female flowers is tubular. The anthers are 2-celled, and the ovary is 1-celled. They are natives of tropical America and tropical Africa.

lang-settle (lang'set'l), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of long-settle. See settle.

langshan (lang'shan), n. [A locality near Shanghai.] A breed of the domestic fowl, of Chinese origin. It is of the Asiatic type, of uniform glossy-black plumage, and of about the weight of the cochin, but taller, less heavily feathered on the shanks, and with white instead of yellow skin.

langteraloo†, n. Same as lanterloo.

language[1] (lang'gwāj), n. [The u is a modern ✶insertion (orig. not pronounced), after F. langue, L. lingua; < ME. langage, < OF. langage, F. langage = Pr. lenguatge, lengatge, lengage = Sp. lenguaje = Pg. linguage, linguagem = It. linguaggio, < ML. as if linguaticum*, language (the reg. L. and ML. word being lingua), < L. lingua (> It. lingua = Sp. lengua = Pg. lingoa, lingua = F. langue), the tongue, a tongue, language, = E. tongue: see tongue.] 1. The whole body of uttered signs employed and understood by a given community as expression of its thoughts; the aggregate of words, and of methods of their combination into sentences, used in a community for communication and record and for carrying on the processes of thought: as, the English language; the Greek language. The languages of the world, each of them unintelligible to the speakers of any other, are very numerous, rather exceeding than falling short of a thousand. Of these, each individual (without reference to his race) acquires for his first language or "mother-tongue" that one which he hears used by those about him in childhood, as he may later learn some other, even to the substitution of it for his "mother-tongue" and oblivion of the latter. Many languages are related with one another—that is, there is such correspondence in their words and forms as shows them to have descended from a common ancestor, or to have reached their present form by gradual divergent alteration of the same original language, since, by the action of its speakers, every living language is undergoing constant change. A body of languages thus related is called a family or stock; and the classification of all human tongues into families is one of the most important results of the study of language. Families then are divided into subordinate divisions called groups, branches, subbranches, or the like. Examples of families are the Aryan or Indo-European, the Semitic, and so on. (See the various names.) With reference to their relationship to a larger class, languages are also called dialects: thus, Yorkshire and Scotch are dialects of English; English and Dutch are Low-German dialects; German, Slavonic, Celtic, etc., are Aryan dialects. (See dialect.) Languages differ not only in material, but also in regard to structure, or the apparatus of forms, connections, auxiliaries, etc., by which the modifications and relations of ideas are expressed. Some are more synthetic, some more analytic; some are isolating, or destitute of formal distinctions, whether of parts of speech or of inflections; some are agglutinative, or have words made up of parts rather loosely joined together; some have their words, or part of them, more completely integrated, to the complete disguise of their original constituents, and even, in greater or less part, the substitution of an internal change (as in sing, sang, sung, song) for an external (as in love, loved, loving, lover). This characteristic is called inflective, and is seen in highest degree in two of the families (Aryan and Semitic) mentioned above. (See agglutinate.) Languages are usually designated by an adjective formed (in -ish[1], -an, -ese, -ic, -ine[1], etc., or without any termination) from the name of the country or people (such adjective used alone, as a noun, being the particular name of the language), as English, Spanish, Scottish, Scotch, Dutch, Welsh, French, Italian, Russian, Chinese, Siamese, Gaelic, Arabic, Latin, Greek, etc.; but the name is often of other origin or formation, as Sanskrit, Prakrit.

In that lond of Caldee, thei han here propre Langages, and here propre Lettres. Mandeville, Travels, p. 153.

After a speach is fully fashioned to the common vnderstanding, & accepted by consent of a whole countrey & nation, it is called a language.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 120.

2. Power of expression by utterance; the capacities and impulses that lead to the production and use of languages; uttered expression; human speech considered as a whole: as, language is the peculiar possession of man.

You taught me language; and my profit on 't
Is, I know how to curse. Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 363.

The ends of language in our discourse with others being chiefly these three: First, to make known one man's thoughts or ideas to another; secondly, to do it with as much ease and quickness as is possible; and thirdly, thereby to convey the knowledge of things. Language is either abused or deficient, when it fails in any of these three.
Locke, Human Understanding, III. x. 23.

3. The words or expressions appropriate to or especially employed in any branch of knowledge or particular condition of life: as, the language of chemistry; the language of common life.—4. The manner of expression, either by speech or writing; style.

With good ensaumple and faire langage
His fadir taught him weel and faire.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 48.

Their language simple, as their manners meek,
No shining ornaments have they to seek.
Cowper, Hope, l. 764.

Hence—5. The inarticulate sounds by which irrational animals express their feelings and wants: as, the language of birds.

Choughs' language, gabble enough, and good enough.
Shak., All's Well, iv. 1. 22.

6. The expression of thought in any way, articulate or inarticulate, conventional or unconventional: as, the language of signs; the language of the eyes; the language of flowers.

Fie, fie upon her!
There's language in her eye, her cheek, her lip;
Nay, her foot speaks. Shak., T. and C., iv. 5. 55.

To him who in the love of Nature holds Communion with her visible forms, she speaks
A various language. Bryant, Thanatopsis.

The word language, in its most limited application, is restricted to human articulate speech; but in its metaphorical use it embraces every mode of communication by which facts can be made known, sentiments or passions expressed, or emotions excited.
G. P. Marsh, Lects. on Eng. Lang., ii.

7†. A people or race, as distinguished by its speech; a tribe.

All the people, the nations, and the languages, fell down and worshipped the golden image. Dan. iii. 7.

Ten men . . . out of all languages of the nations . . . shall take hold of the skirt of him that is a Jew.
Zech. viii. 23.

Dead language, a language which is no longer spoken or in vernacular use by a people as the traditional and native means of expression. Some dead languages have disappeared, leaving no representatives, as the Etruscan and Egyptian; others have been succeeded by tongues descended from them and more or less resembling them, as Latin and Anglo-Saxon; some, by an artificial process of instruction, are still learned and used for writing and speaking, like Latin, Sanskrit, and Hebrew.

The languages, especially the dead,
The sciences, and all the most abstruse.
Byron, Don Juan, i. 40.

Flash language. See flash[5].—King's language†. See king[1].—Law language. See law[1].—Living language, a language still spoken or in vernacular use by a people.

Now the Coptic is no more a living language, nor is it understood by any, except that some of the priests understand a little of their liturgy, tho' many of them cannot so much as read it, but get their long offices by rote.
Pococke, Description of the East, I. 245.

The bow-wow and pooh-pooh theories of language, nicknames applied to the theories which recognize, respectively, imitations of natural cries and interjections as the first beginnings of language. =Syn. 1. Language, Dialect, Idiom, Diction, Vocabulary; tongue. The first five words are arranged in a descending scale. In common use it is taken for granted that the dialects under one language are enough alike to be reasonably well understood by all who are of that language, while different languages are so unlike that special study is needed to enable one to understand a language that is not his own; but this is not an essential difference. Idiom, literally a personal peculiarity, is in this connection a form of a language somewhat less marked than a dialect: as, the New England idiom. Diction is often used for the set of words or vocabulary belonging to a person or class, making him or it differ in speech from others; but both this and idiom are often expressed by dialect. (See diction.) Vocabulary means the total of the words used by a person, class, etc., considered as a list or number of different words: as, he has a large vocabulary. In this respect it differs from another meaning of idiom—that is, any peculiar combination of words used by a person, community, nation, etc.

Every class [in the community], however constituted, has its dialectic differences; . . . each trade, calling, profession, department of study, has its technical vocabulary. . . . The highly cultivated have a diction which is not in all its parts at the command of the vulgar. . . . We must notice . . . the meaning of the terms language and dialect in their relation to one another. They are only two names for the same thing, as looked at from different points of view. Any body of expressions used by a community, however limited and humble, for the purpose of communication and as the instrument of thought, is a language. . . . On the other hand, there is no tongue in the world to which we should not with perfect freedom and perfect propriety apply the name of dialect when considering it as one of a body of related forms of speech.

language[1] (lang'gwāj), v. t.; pret. and pp. languaged, ppr. languaging. [< language[1], n.] To express in language. [Rare.]

Laniidæ (lā-nī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lanius + -idæ.] A large family of dentirostral laminiplantar acromyodian birds of the order Passeres; the shrikes. They are characterized by the combination of comparatively weak and strictly passerine feet with a hooked and notched or toothed bill of semiraptorial efficiency. The tarsi are not booted; the wing has 10 primaries; the nostrils are usually concealed by antrorse plumules; and the plumage generally is dense. There are about 200 species, of numerous genera and several subfamilies, inhabiting nearly all parts of the world. The name has been used with great latitude, covering many shrike-like birds now located apart, as in Artamidæ, Dicruridæ, and elsewhere. See drongo, swallow-shrike, wood-shrike. Also Laniadæ, Lanidæ.

laniiform (lạ-nī'i-fôrm), a. [< NL. Lanius, q. v., + L. forma, form.] Resembling a shrike; dentirostral, as a bird; of or pertaining to the Laniiformes.

Laniiformes (lạ-nī-i-fôr'mēz), n. pl. [NL., < Lanius, q. v., + L. forma, form.] Same as Dentirostres, 2.

Laniinæ (lā-ni-ī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Lanius + -inæ.] The typical subfamily of Laniidæ; the true shrikes or butcher-birds. The rounded wings and tail are of nearly equal lengths, the rictus is bristly, and the tarsi are scutellate outside as well as in front. See Lanius. Also Lanianæ, Laninæ.

Lanio (lā'ni-ō), n. [NL., < LL. lanio, a butcher: see laniary.] A genus of tanagers of the family Tanagridæ, having a shrike-like bill with dentate upper mandible. There are several species, as L. aurantius; all are South American.

Lanius (lā'ni-us), n. [NL., < L. lanius, butcher: see laniary.] A restricted genus of butcher-birds, of simple bluish-gray and white coloration, varied with black on the wings and tail; the gray shrikes. The term was formerly applied indiscriminately to laniiform or dentirostral birds, many of which do not even belong to Laniidæ. L. excubitor is the common gray shrike of Europe; L. borealis is the great northern shrike or butcher-bird of North America; and L. ludovicianus is the loggerhead of the southern United States. See also cut under butcher-bird.

Fiscal Shrike (Lanius or Fiscus collaris).

lank1 (langk), a. [< ME. lank, < AS. hlanc, lank (applied to a wolf, and to a leather bottle). Cf. *lank*2.] 1. Meagerly slim; attenuated; lean; gaunt: as, a tall, lank man.

She [Diana] . . . had unlaste
Her silver buskins from her nimble thigh,
And her lanck loynes ungirt.
Spenser, F. Q., III. vi. 18.

Meagre and lank with fasting grown,
And nothing left but skin and bone. Swift.

2. Loose or lax and yielding readily to pressure; not distended; shrunken; shriveled: as, a lank sack or purse.

The clergy's bags
Are lank and lean with thy extortions.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., i. 3. 132.

3. Straight and flat, as hair.

If any Gentlemens or Childrens Hair be never so Lank, she makes it Curle in a little time like a Periwig.
Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [I. 147.

His visage was meagre, his hair lank and thin.
Swift, Gulliver's Travels, iii. 8.

4†. Languid; drooping.

Who, piteous of her woes, rear'd her lank head.
Milton, Comus, l. 836.

lank1† (langk), n. [< *lank*1, a.] Lankness; leanness. [Probably used in the following quotation for its agreement in sound with bank.]

He [S. Daniel] had neither a bank of wealth or lank of want; living in a competent condition.
Fuller, Worthies, III. 104.

lank1 (langk), v. i. [< lank, a.] To grow or become lank or thin. [Rare.]

All this . . .
Was borne so like a soldier, that thy cheek lansfordite (lanz′ford-īt), n. [< Lansford (see def.) + -ite[2].] A hydrous carbonate of magnesium occurring in stalactitic forms in a coal-mine at Lansford in Pennsylvania.

Lansium (lan′si-um), n. [NL. (Rumpf, 1741), < lansa or lanseh, the East Indian name of the tree.] A genus of East Indian trees belonging to the family Meliaceæ, tribe Trichilieæ, having the 5 petals imbricated, 10 anthers, a 3- to 5-celled ovary and berry, and ariled seeds. These trees have odd-pinnate leaves, small, axillary, panicled or racemose flowers, and large yellow or red berries. There are 2, 3, or 4 species, according to different authors, inhabiting the mountains of India and of the Indian archipelago. L. domesticum is cultivated for its yellow berry, which contains within a bitter skin a pleasant subacid pulp. It is the lansa, lanseh, or langsat, and the berry is known as ayer-ayer.

lansket†, n. [Origin obscure.] A word occurring only in the following passage, where it is supposed to mean a lattice or panel:

> Petron. How know'st thou?
> Jacques. I peep'd in
> At a loose lansket. Fletcher, Tamer Tamed, ii. 6.

lansquenet (lans′ke-net), n. [< F. lansquenet, < G. landsknecht, a foot-soldier, < lands, gen. of land, land, + knecht, a boy, servant: see land[1] and knight. Cf. lance-knight.] 1†. One of a class of mercenary foot-soldiers or pikemen who in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries formed a large proportion of both the German and French armies. They took their name from that of the class of German serfs who in war attended their knights on foot, fighting with light arms and without armor, from which class the first permanent infantry corps was formed by Maximilian I. at the end of the fifteenth century.

2. A game at cards. It is played by an unlimited number of persons against a banker, with one or more packs of cards. Bets laid on cards as they are dealt go to the banker or to the players according as these cards match with others considered as belonging to one side or the other. The game admits of much trickery.

lant[1] (lant), n. [Var. of land[2].] Urine; especially, stale urine. Stale urine, or lant, has been much used as a detergent in wool-scouring on account of the ammonium carbonate it contains. Though still used, it has been largely supplanted by ammonia, sodium carbonate, etc.

> The use of sulphurous acid, and of ammoniacal liquors in the form of lant or stale urine, is known (from drawings on the walls of Pompeii) to have been practised by the Romans. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 509.

lant[1] (lant), v. t. [< lant[1], n.] To wet or mingle with urine.

lant[2] (lant), n. [Abbr. of lanterloo.] A contraction of lanterloo.

lant[4]†. An obsolete preterit of lend[1].

Lantana (lan-tā′nạ), n. [NL. (Linnæus).] 1. A genus of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants of the family Verbenaceæ, type of Endlicher's tribe and de Candolle's subtribe Lantaneæ, characterized by a small, membranaceous, truncate, sinuose-dentate calyx, a corolla with 4 or 5 lobes, and a juicy drupe. Some 40 or 50 species are known, chiefly tropical or subtropical American, but a few are natives of Asia and Africa. They are mostly low shrubs, but sometimes climbing high, sometimes mere herbs, with opposite toothed leaves, often roughened, and dense spikes or heads of smallish red, orange, white, or variously colored flowers sessile in the axils of bracts. Two of the tropical American species (L. trifolia and L. Camara) have become extensively naturalized in the Old World. Many of the species are cultivated as greenhouse-plants and set out in summer, flowering freely till frost, the flowers and herbage being sometimes pleasantly odorous. Among the most common of these are L. Camara, L. mista, L. nivea, L. involucrata, and L. Sellowiana. The flowers of most of these species change their color with age. In Jamaica the plants of this genus are called wild sage. Four species are found within the limits of the United States, chiefly in the southwest. The South American species L. macrophylla is employed in infusions as a stimulant.

Lantana mutabilis.
a, flower; b, flower cut longitudinally, showing pistil and two of the stamens; c, fruits.

2. [l. c.] A plant of the genus Lantana.

Lantaneæ (lan-tā′nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Lantana + -cæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Verbenaceæ, founded on the genus Lantana, by de Candolle reduced to a subtribe of the tribe Verbeneæ, but made a tribe by Engler.

lantanium (lan-tā′ni-um), n. See lanthanium.

lanterloo† (lan′tėr-lō), n. [Also lantereloo, langteraloo, lantrillou, etc.; = D. lanterlu, < F. lanterlu, lanterelu, orig. the refrain of a popular song.] A game of cards, now commonly called loo, sometimes lanz. See loo[2].

> Were she at her Parish Church, in the Height of her Devotion, should any Body in the Interim but stand at the Church Door and hold up the Knave of Clubs, she would take it to be a Challenge at Lanctre Loo.
> Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [I. 103.

Lanterloo, lantrillou, or lanctreloo, a game in which the knave of clubs is the highest card.
A. Dobson, Selections from Steele, Notes, p. 480.

★lantern (lan′tėrn), n. [Until recently also lanthorn, a popular spelling simulating horn (in supposed allusion to the transparent plates of horn which often formed the sides of lanterns); < ME. lanterne, < F. lanterne = Sp. Pg. It. lanterna, < L. lanterna, laterna, < Gr. λαμπτήρ, a stand or grate used in lighting, a torch, < λάμπειν, give light: see lamp[1].] 1. A case, generally transparent or translucent, inclosing a light and protecting it from the wind and rain, and either portable or fixed. The earliest form appears to have been a collapsing corrugated tube of some semi-transparent fabric inclosing a lamp or candle. This form survives in the Chinese paper lanterns. Lanterns have been made of horn, talc, mica, perforated metals, oiled fabrics, paper, and glass.

Ship's Lanterns.
a, octagon lantern; b, masthead-lantern; c, signal-lantern.

> He [Hunger] buffated the Brutener a-boute the chekes,

> Piers Plowman (C), ix. 174.

> My natural Lanthorn, whose diaphanous side
> Can both transmit and safely keep the Light.
> J. Beaumont, Psyche, iv. 46.

All the way, quite through Hyde Park to the Queen's palace at Kensington, has lanterns for illuminating the road in the dark nights, for the Coaches.
Thoresby, Diary, June 15, 1712.

> At the watchman's lantern borrowing light, > Finds a cold bed her only comfort left.
> Cowper, Task, ii. 654.

2. The glass casing surrounding the lamp of a lighthouse and forming the upper member of the structure.

Upon the shore there is an high Lanthorn, large enough at the top to contain about three score persons, which by night directeth the Sailer into the entrance of the Bosphorus. Sandys, Travailes, p. 31.

3. In arch., specifically, an upright skylight in the roof of a building. It is distinguished from an ordinary skylight in that it has vertical sides. Of this nature is the open tower often placed, especially in English church architecture, at the junction of the cross in a cruciform plan. Such a lantern has the whole or a considerable part of the interior open to view from below, and receives light from a range of windows extending entirely around it. The name is also applied to a more or less open construction on the top of a tower, or crowning a dome, although not serving to admit light to the interior; also to a louver. See cuts under dome and domical.

Lantern.—Abbey Church of St. Ouen, Rouen, France; 14th and 15th centuries.

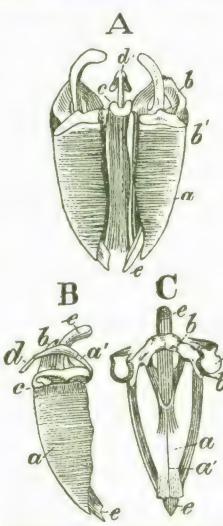
The most considerable object is the great abby and church, large and rich, built after the Gotic manner, having two spires and middle lanterne at the west end all of stone.
Evelyn, Diary, March 25, 1644.

Upon the cupola was to stand the lantern, that was to form the proper summit of the whole vast edifice, and on the proportions and design of which the effect of the dome itself would be greatly dependent.
C. E. Norton, Church-building in Middle Ages, p. 282.

4. In the quadrant electrometer, the part of the case of the instrument which surrounds the mirror and suspension-fibers.—5. A device for inclosing fabrics in the process of dyeing, to fix the colors by the aid of steam.—6. A workmen's name for a short perforated core used in making hollow castings.

It must be modelled in loam, upon a piece of cast iron called a lantern, made expressly for this purpose. The lantern is a cylinder or a truncated hollow cone of cast iron, about half an inch thick, and differently shaped for every core. Ure, Dict., II. 479.

7. A kind of cog-wheel. See lantern-wheel.—8. (a) The whiff, a fish, which is semi-transparent when held up against the light. Day. [Local, Eng.] (b) The Trigla obscura, a fish of the subfamily Triglinæ. Also called lantern-gurnard.—Astronomical lantern. See astronomical.—Blind lantern. See blind[1].—Bull's-eye lantern. See bull's-eye, 7.—Chinese lantern, a collapsible hand-lantern of paper crimped or arranged in folds like the sides of a bellows or an accordion, used by the Chinese, Japanese, etc. These lanterns are either globular or cylindrical in shape, and are generally decorated with flowers or other designs, those intended for use as lanterns and not for mere ornament being also oiled, and provided with a short handle or staff for convenience in carrying. The streets of Chinese and Japanese cities being unlighted, it is necessary for those who move abroad after dark to be provided with lanterns.—Dark lantern, a hand-lantern having an opaque slide or cover permitting the light to be wholly or almost wholly obscured at pleasure.



> I do walk
> Methinks like Guido Faux,

Lantern of Aristotle, or Aristotle's lantern, in zoöl., the highly developed complex dentary apparatus or oral skeleton and associate soft parts of a sea-urchin (Echinus). See the extract.

Dentary Apparatus or Oral Skeleton of a Sea-urchin (Echinus sphæra), constituting Aristotle's Lantern.
A, two of the five chief component parts apposed and viewed laterally. B, side view, and C, back view of one piece. a, principal piece of alveolus; a′, its suture with its fellow; b, epiphysis; b′, its suture with principal piece; c, rotula; d, radius or compass; e, tooth.

In the Echinidea the oral skeleton attains its highest development in the so-called Aristotle's lantern of the seaurchins. . . . The lantern consists of twenty principal pieces—five teeth, five alveoli, five rotulæ, and five radii—of which the alveoli are again divisible into four pieces each, and the radii into two, making a total of forty pieces. . . . Besides the inter-alveolar muscles, . . . this complex apparatus has protractor, . . . oblique, . . . transverse, . . . and retractor muscles. . . . A similar but less complex oral skeleton exists in most Clypeastroida, but nothing of this kind has yet been discovered in the Spatangoida. Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 492.

Lantern of the dead, in central and western France, a slender medieval tower of common occurrence in cemeteries, having apertures at the top where a light was displayed at night. A class of round towers in Ireland may have served a similar purpose.—Magic lantern, an optical instrument, first described by Kircher in 1646, by means of which small images are thrown on a white wall or screen in a dark room, magnified to any size at pleasure. It consists of a closed lantern or box, in which are placed a lamp and a concave mirror which reflects the light of the lamp through an adjustable tube in the side of the lantern. At the inner end of this tube is fixed a plano-convex lens and at the outer end a convex projecting lens. Between the two lenses are successively placed slips of glass bearing transparent photographs or paintings, which are thrown in a magnified form on the wall or screen opposite to the lantern.

Lantern of the Dead, Antigny, France. (From Viollet-le-Duc's "Dict. de l'Architecture.")

lantern (lan'tėrn), v. t. [Formerly also lanthorn; < lantern, n.] 1. To furnish with a lantern; light as by means of a lantern: as, to lantern a lighthouse.

The part of one body which lies on and covers part of another; the amount or extent of such covering: as, the lap of a slate in roofing. —3. In the steam-engine, the space over which a slide-valve travels after the closing of the steam-passage to or from the cylinder before reaching its central position. The outside lap is the space traversed by the slide-valve after it has passed the inlet-port and cut off the supply of steam from the cylinder, and is intended to cause the engine to do a part of its work by expansion; the inside lap is the space traversed by the valve before the end of the stroke, after it has shut off the exhaust of steam. It leaves a portion of vapor confined within the cylinder to act as an elastic cushion against the down stroke of the piston.

Expansive working, however, becomes possible when we give the valve what is called lap.
Encyc. Brit., XXII. 501.

4. A thick roll or sheet of cotton, wool, or the like, in various stages of manufacture.

The felt for these purposes is made chiefly from wool, which is, after washing, first carded out into exceedingly fine uniform gossamer-like laps. Encyc. Brit., IX. 68.

A pair of large fluted rollers, revolving in the same direction, takes on the sheet of cotton until it has formed a thick roll, technically called a lap.
Spons' Encyc. Manuf., I. 742.

5. A wheel or disk of lead, copper, wood, leather, or other substance, which, being charged with polishing- or cutting-powder, is used in cutting gems, glass, etc., or in polishing gems and cutlery. In some trades and for some purposes the outer edge or periphery of the wheel is covered with the polishing-powder and applied to the material to be fashioned; in others the face or flat side of the wheel is used. 6. In gun-making, a lead casting made to fit the bore of a rifle, with which the rifling is smoothed and polished.—7. In euchre, a lapping of the count from one game to the next; the carrying of a surplus of points at the end of a game over to the score of the next game: done by agreement, not as a regular feature of the game.—8†. A course or round, as in running; a lapping or roundabout run.

When their lap is finished, the cautious huntsman to their kennel gathers the nimblefooted hounds.
Fielding, Jonathan Wild, i. 14.

9. In walking-matches and similar contests, a single round of the course along which competitors have to go a certain number of times in order to complete a specified distance. Thus, if a course is 440 yards, a pedestrian would have to do four laps or lengths to complete a mile.—Left in the lapst, embarrassed. Nares.

Viden me tuis consiliis impeditum esse? Dost thou not see me brought in the briars, or left in the laps, through thy devise and counsaile? Terence in English (1614).

numbers and damage cereal crops and pastures, occasionally even vegetable-gardens. Riley, 7th Mo. Ent. Rep., p. 49.

lapicide† (lap'i-sīd), n. [< L. lapicida, prop. (LL.) lapidicida, a stone-cutter, < lapis (lapid-), a stone, + -cida, < cædere, cut.] A stone-cutter. Coles, 1717.

lapidable† (lap'i-dạ-bl), a. [< lapid(ate) + -able.] That may be stoned. Bailey, 1731.

lapidarian (lap-i-dā'ri-ạn), a. [As lapidary + -an.] Same as lapidary. Croker. [Rare.]

lapidarious (lap-i-dā'ri-us), a. [< L. lapidarius, belonging to stones: see lapidary.] Consisting of stones; stony. Coles, 1717. [Rare.]

lapidarist (lap'i-dạ-rist), n. [As lapidar(y) + -ist.] A person versed in the lapidary art; a connoisseur of fine stones or gems; a lapidist.

The stone called sapphire by Pliny is now known to lapidarists as lapis lazuli. Sci. Amer., N. S., LV. 84.

lapidary (lap'i-dā-ri), a. and n. [= F. lapidaire = Sp. Pg. It. lapidario, < L. lapidarius, of or belonging to stones or stone; as a noun, a stone-cutter; < lapis (lapid-), a stone: see lapis.]

I. a. 1. Pertaining to a stone or stones; having relation to stones: as, the lapidary bee (which see, below).—2. Pertaining or relating to, or used in, the working of stone or stones, especially of fine stones or gems, as cutting, polishing, engraving, etc.: as, the lapidary art; a lapidary wheel.—3. Engraved or inscribed upon stone: as, lapidary verses.

The lapidary alphabet, used for inscriptions and coins, is square and angular, the letters being of equal height, and composed largely of vertical and horizontal lines. Isaac Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 147.

Both styles of capital writing were obviously borrowed from the lapidary alphabets employed under the empire. Encyc. Brit., XVIII. 152.

4. Of or pertaining to inscriptions cut in stone, or to any formal inscriptions; monumental: as, the lapidary style of composition or of lettering.

A nobler eulogium than all the lapidary adulation of modern epitaphs. Connoisseur, No. 131. (Latham.)

Lapidary bee, Bombus lapidarius, a bumblebee with a black body and red end of the abdomen. It nests in stony places.—Lapidary mill. (a) A lapidaries' grinding-, cutting-, and polishing-apparatus, including the bench and the machinery for the wheels or laps, the slitting-, roughing-, smoothing-, and polishing-mills, and the slitting- and grinding-wheels. (b) A lapidary wheel.—Lapidary style, in lit., a style appropriate for monumental and other inscriptions, or characteristic of inscriptions.—Lapidary wheel, a wheel for cutting and polishing, used by lapidaries. There are two kinds of these wheels: (1) the slicer, a thin iron wheel edged with diamond-dust, used like a saw; (2) the lap or mill, used for grinding and polishing, usually working horizontally and performing its function by means of its upper face or disk, which is faced with metal, wood, leather, or other material, and is strewn with polishing or abrading powder of different degrees of hardness and fineness. E. H. Knight.

II. n.; pl. lapidaries (-riz). 1. A stone-cutter; one who cuts and prepares and inscribes tombstones.—2. Specifically, a workman in fine and hard stones; one who does any kind of skilled work on precious or semi-precious stones, as cutting, polishing, engraving, the formation of useful or decorative articles, etc.

The lapidaries now shall learn to set
Their diamonds in gold, and not in jet.
Brome, To his Mistress.

When practicable, the lapidary avails himself of the natural cleavages in the mineral upon which he is going to operate. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 299.

3. A virtuoso of lapidary work; a lapidarist. [Rare.]—Lapidaries' cloth-mill, a lapidary wheel, about 2 inches thick, consisting of a center of wood about 6 inches in diameter, upon which a spiral coil of list or cloth is wound closely until the diameter of the wheel is about 10 inches. The cloth or list face is dressed true and even with an iron heated to a dull red. This mill is used generally with pumice-stone and water, and by reason of its elasticity is well adapted to operate upon curved surfaces of shells and stones.

lapidate (lap'i-dāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. lapidated, ppr. lapidating. [< L. lapidatus, pp. of lapidare (> It. lapidare = Sp. Pg. Pr. lapidar = F. lapider), throw stones at, stone, < lapis (lapid-), a stone: see lapis. Cf. dilapidate.] 1. To stone; throw stones at; hit with stones. [Rare.]

I have been in the catacombs—caves very curious indeed—we were lapidated by the natives—pebbled to some purpose, I give you my word. Scott, St. Ronan's Well, xxxi.

The season for lapidating the professors is now at hand; keep him quiet at Holland House till all is over. Sydney Smith, To Lady Holland.

2. To cut and polish, as a stone by a lapidary.

The ruby-colored ones [tourmalines] when lapidated being easily mistaken for rubies. Eng. Consul at Bahia, quoted in Phila. Times, May 3, 1886.

lapidation (lap-i-dā'shọn), n. [= F. lapidation = Pr. lapidatio = Sp. lapidación = Pg. lapidação = It. lapidazione, < L. lapidatio(n-), a stoning, < lapidare, stone: see lapidate.] The act of throwing stones at a person or of striking a person with stones; punishment or execution by stoning.

All adulterers should be executed by lapidation; the ancienter punishment was burning: death always, though in divers forms. Bp. Hall, Contemplations, iv. 15.

Adultery, if detected, would be punished by lapidation according to the rigor of the Koranic law. R. F. Burton, El-Medinah, p. 284.

lapidator (lap'i-dā-tọr), n. [= It. lapidatore, < L. lapidator, a stoner, < lapidare, stone: see lapidate.] One who stones. [Rare.]

lapideon (lā-pid'ē-on), n. [< L. lapis (lapid-), a stone, + -eon, as in melodeon, etc.] A musical instrument, invented by M. Baudry, consisting of a graduated series of flints so suspended on a frame that they can be sounded by blows from wooden or stone hammers.

lapideous (lā-pid'ē-us), a. [= Sp. lapídeo = Pg. lapideo, < L. lapideus, stony, < lapis (lapid-), a stone: see lapis. Cf. lapidose.] Of the nature of stone; consisting of stone; stony. [Rare.]

A chylifactory menstruum or digestive preparation, drawn from species or individuals whose stomachs peculiarly dissolve lapideous bodies. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 5.

lapides, n. Plural of lapis.

lapidescence† (lap-i-des'ẹns), n. [< lapidescen(t) + -ce.] The state of being lapidescent, or the process of petrifying.

They [chemists] do with much confidence entirely ascribe the induration and especially the lapidescence of bodies to a certain secret internal principle, lurking for the most part in some liquid vehicle. Boyle, Works, I. 434.

lapidescency† (lap-i-des'ẹn-si), n. Same as lapidescence.

The lapidescencies and petrifactive mutations of hard bodies. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 23.

lapidescent† (lap-i-des'ẹnt), a. and n. [= F. lapidescent = It. lapidescente, < L. lapidescen(t-)s, ppr. of lapidescere, become stone, petrify, < lapis (lapid-), a stone: see lapis.] I. a. 1. Turning to stone; petrifying.

A spring within the bowells of ye earth, very deepe, & so excessive cold that the drops meeting wth some lapidescent matter converts them into an hard stone, which hangs about it like icicles. Evelyn, Diary, June 20, 1644.

2. Petrifactive; lapidific; having the power of converting to stone.

Beneath the surface of the Earth there may be sulphureous and other steams, that may be plentifully mixed with water, and there, in likelihood, with lapidescent liquors. Boyle, Works, III. 557.

II. n. A substance which has the quality of petrifying another substance, or converting it to stone.

lapidific (lap-i-dif'ik), a. [= F. lapidifique = Sp. lapidífico = It. lapidifico, < L. lapis (lapid-), a stone, + facere, make.] Forming or converting into stone.

Arguing that the atoms of the lapidifick, as well as of the saline principle, being regular, do therefore concur in producing regular stones. N. Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, i. 3.

But have we any better proof of such an effort of nature than of her shooting a lapidific juice into the form of a shell? Jefferson, Correspondence, I. 431.

lapidifical (lap-i-dif'i-kạl), a. [< lapidific + -al.] Same as lapidific. Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., ii. 5.

lapidification (lā-pid''i-fi-kā'shọn), n. [= F. lapidification = Sp. lapidificación = It. lapidificazione, < NL. lapidificatio(n-), the act of turning substances into stone, < lapidificare, lapidify: see lapidify.] Petrifaction; the process of conversion into stone.

Induration, or lapidification of substances more soft, is likewise another degree of condensation. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 82.

We must suppose that an interval of time elapsed before the commencement of lapidification, during which the cellular tissue was obliterated. Sir C. Lyell, Elem. of Geol. (6th ed.), p. 43.

lapidify (lā-pid'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. lapidified, ppr. lapidifying. [= F. lapidifier = Sp. Pg. lapidificar, < NL. lapidificare*, make stone, turn into stone, < L. lapis (lapid-), a stone, + facere, make. Cf. lapidific.] To convert into stone; petrify. [Rare.]

lapidist (lap'i-dist), n. [< L. lapis (lapid-), a stone (see lapis), + -ist.] 1†. A lapidary.

The factitious stones of chymists in imitation [of adamant] being easily detected by an ordinary lapidist. Ray, Works of Creation, i.

2. An expert in precious and semi-precious stones; a student of mineralogy, especially in relation to stones used for decoration.

lapidose (lap'i-dōs), a. [ME. lapidose = F. lapideux = Sp. It. lapidoso, < L. lapidosus, stony, < lapis (lapid-), a stone: see lapis. Cf. lapideous.] 1†. Stony.

Ther [where] cleyi landes are & lapidose;
With dounge is goode to help hem.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 215.

2. In bot., growing in stony places.

lapilliform (lā-pil'i-fôrm), a. [< L. lapillus, a little stone (see lapillus), + forma, form.] Having the form of small stones.

lapillus (lā-pil'us), n.; pl. lapilli (-ī). [L., dim. of lapis, a stone: see lapis.] 1. A small stone; specifically, in the plural, fragmentary materials ejected from volcanoes in eruption, varying in size from that of dust to that of a walnut. They are sometimes so cellular in structure as to float on the surface of water.—2. In anat., an ear-stone; an otolith; one of the hard concretions found in the fluid of the labyrinth of the ear of many animals. See otolith.

lapis (lā'pis), n.; pl. lapides (-pid-dēz). [L., a stone; akin to Gr. λέπας, a bare rock, λεπίς, a flake, scale, < λέπειν, peel, scale off: see lepis.] 1. A stone: used only as a Latin word. See phrases below.—2. A kind of calico-printing with indigo in which the resists are so composed that they act as a mordant for other dyes, those parts of the cloth which by the resist are protected from the action of the indigo, and are thus left white, being dyed in turn by madder or quercitron-bark. The patterns so produced were thought to bear some resemblance to lapis lazuli; hence the name.—Lapis causticus (caustic stone), caustic potash.—Lapis divinus (divine stone), a preparation of copper sulphate, potassium nitrate, and alum, 16 parts each, and camphor one part, fused together.—Lapis infernalis (infernal stone), fused nitrate of silver, or lunar caustic.—Lapis lazuli (azure stone), a silicate of sodium, calcium, and aluminium with a sulphur compound of sodium, allied in composition to haüyne and nosean. It occurs massive, and has usually a rich ultramarine-blue color, which makes it highly esteemed as an ornamental stone. It is hard enough to be engraved and cut into cameos, but large masses cannot be used in this way, because of flaws. That which comes from Persia and China is finest in color. By isolating and powdering the blue coloring matter the pigment called native or real ultramarine is obtained. See ultramarine.—Lapis-lazuli blue a deep blue used in decoration, especially in Oriental porcelain and in the porcelain of Sèvres. The Sèvres blue is deeper in color than that which bears the same name in Oriental porcelain, and is commonly clouded or mottled, and sometimes veined with gold.—Lapis-lazuli ware, a name given by Josiah Wedgwood to a variety of his pebbleware which was veined with gold upon blue. See pebbleware.—Lapis Lydius (Lydian stone), touchstone or basanite, a variety of silicious slate.—Lapis ollaris (potstone), soapstone, potstone, or talc, a hydrated silicate of magnesium.

Lapith (lap'ith), n.; pl. Lapithæ or Lapiths (-i-thē, -iths). [< L. Lapithæ, < Gr. Λαπίθαι: see Lapithæ.] One of the Lapithæ.

The Lapiths [Parthenon] are youthful, beardless, slim, but firmly knit. A. S. Murray, Greek Sculpture, II. 55.

Lapithæ (lap'i-thē), n. pl. [L., < Gr. Λαπίθαι.] In Gr. myth., a people of Thessaly, held to be the descendants of Lapithes, son of Apollo, celebrated for their wars with the Centaurs, and especially for their chastisement, with the aid of Theseus, of the Centaurs for an attempt to carry off Hippodameia and other women from the feast at her marriage with Pirithous, ruler of the Lapithæ. The word is of frequent occurrence in treatises on Greek art, combats between Lapithæ and Centaurs having been a favorite subject with Greek artists.

Lapith Fighting with Centaur.—Metope of the Parthenon.

lap-joint (lap′joint), n. A joint in which one edge of a board, plank, or plate overlaps the edge of another piece, the edges being partly cut away so that the pieces are in parallel relation with each other. The term is used in contradistinction to butting-joint. The joints of weather-boarding in house-building and the so-called "clincher build" of boats are familiar examples. Also lapped joint.—Half-lap joint, in couplings, a joint formed by making the ends of shafts semi-cylindrical and putting them together so that the tongue of one fits into the recess of the other. The joint is then covered with a thimble or ring in which it is secured by a key. See cut under coupling.

lap-jointed (lap′join″ted), a. Having joints formed by edges (as of plates) overlapping, as steam-boilers, iron ships, etc.—Lap-jointed work. Same as clincher-work.

Laplace's coefficients, equation, function, ★theorem, etc. See coefficient, etc.

Laplacian (lä-plä′si-an), a. [< Laplace (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to Pierre Simon de Laplace, a great French astronomer and mathematician (1749–1827).

This primitive Kantian and Laplacian evolutionism, this nebular theory of such exquisite concinnity, . . . has received many hard knocks from astronomers.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXII. 640.

Laplander (lap′lan-dėr), n. [= Sw. Lappländer = Dan. Laplænder; as Lapland (see def.) + -er[1].] A native of Lapland, a region forming the northernmost part of the Scandinavian peninsula, and divided between Norway, Sweden, and Russia. See Lapp.

Lapland finch. See finch[1].

Laplandish (lap′lan-dish), a. [< Lapland + -ish[1].] Pertaining to Lapland or the Laplanders; Lappish.

Lapland rose-bay. See rose-bay.

lapling (lap′ling), n. [< lap[2] + -ling[1].] One who is nursed, as it were, in the lap of ease and luxury: a term of contempt. [Rare.]

You must not stream out your youth in wine, and live a lapling to the silk and dainties.
Hewyt, Sermons (1658), p. 7.

Laportea (lā-pōr′tē-ä), n. [NL., named after a M. Laporte.] A name given by Gaudichaud-Beaupré in 1826 to Urticastrum, a genus of urticaceous plants of the tribe Urticeæ and subtribe Ureræ. They much resemble nettles, and, like them, are provided with stinging hairs. They differ, however, from the genus Urtica in the oblique achenium, connate stipules, and alternate leaves. There are about 25 species, widely dispersed throughout the warmer regions of both hemispheres, especially in the old world, but also in Mexico and farther northward, being absent in South America. They are perennial herbs, shrubs, or even trees, with ample, usually toothed, leaves and minute monœcious or diœcious flowers clustered in loose cymes or glomerules. Urticastrum divaricatum, the wood-nettle, is a common plant throughout the eastern United States. U. gigas of Australia is a large tree 80 feet in height, with extremely light, open-grained wood, and leaves from 12 to 15 inches broad. Its native name is goo-mao-ma, and its colonial name nettle-tree.

Lapp (lap), n. [< Sw. Lapp = Dan. Lap, a Lapp; a name of Lappish origin.] A member of the people from which Lapland takes its name, but which forms only a portion of its population. The Lapps are an inferior branch of the Finnic race, physically dwarfish and weak, and low in the scale of civilization.

lappaceous (la-pā′shius), a. [< L. lappaceus, bur-like, < lappa, a bur.] In bot., pertaining to or resembling a bur.

lappet†, v. and n. An obsolete form of lap.

lappel, n. See lapel.

lapper[1] (lap′ėr), n. [< lap[1] + -er[1].] 1. One who laps with the tongue. Johnson.—2. In entom., one of the trophi or mouth-organs which are used for lapping honey or other food, as the tongue of a bee. Kirby.

lapper[2] (lap′ėr), n. [< lap[3] + -er[1].] 1. One who laps. Specifically—(a) One who wraps or folds: as, a cloth-lapper.

They may be lappers of linen, and bailiffs of the manor.
Swift.

(b) One who uses a lap, as in a lapidary's work.

The lapper produces the plain and diamond-shaped surfaces by the rotary action of the lapidary's wheel.
Goldsmith's Handbook, p. 178.

2. In cotton-manuf., a machine which receives the scutched cotton from the batting- and blowing-machine, and compacts it into a lap or fleece upon the surface of a roller called a lap-roller. This lap or fleece, when it acquires the proper thickness, is torn across, and removed from the lap-roller a, feed-apron; b, feed-rolls; c, beater; d, screens or cages; e, lap-roll; f, calender-rolls.

Cross-section of Cotton Lapper.

a, feed-apron; b, feed-rolls; c, beater; d, screens or cages; e, lap-roll; f, calender-rolls; g, fan exhausting air and drawing the cotton on to the screens.

to be fed to a carding-machine, into which it is carried by the action of feed-rolls and the first card-roller or licker-in. Also called spreader or blower, and lap-machine or lapping-machine.

lapper[3] (lap′ėr), v. t. and i. A Scotch form of lopper[2].

lapper-milk (lap′ėr-milk), n. Loppered milk; ★clabber. [Scotch.]

lappet (lap′et), n. [< ME. lappet; < lap[2] + -et.] 1. A little lap, flap, or pendant, especially on a coat or a head-dress.

When I cut-off this lappet from thy Coat,
Could I not then as well haue cut thy throat?
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Trophies.

Half a dozen squeezed plaits of linnen, to which dangled behind two unmeaning pendants, called lappets, not half covering their strait-drawn hair.
Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, IV. i.

The dalmatic . . . has full sleeves reaching only to the elbows, but prolonged in broad lappets of moderate length.
Encyc. Brit., VI. 467.

2. In ornith., a wattle or other fleshy process hanging from a bird's head.—3. One of certain bombycid moths, as Lasiocampa quercifolia: an English book-name. The small lappet is L. ilicifolia.

lappet (lap′et), v. t. [< lappet, n.] To cover with or as with a lappet. Landor.

lappeted (lap′et-ed), a. [< lappet + -ed[2].] In ornith., wattled; having fleshy lappets at the base of the beak: as, the lappeted lapwing, Hoplopterus tectus or Sarciophorus pileatus.

lappet-end (lap′et-end), n. 1. The free end of a lappet, as of fine lawn or lace, frequently very rich in decoration. Hence—2. A piece of lace or embroidery suitable for making a lappet. Art Jour., N. S., XIX. 8.

lappet-frame (lap′et-frām), n. In lappet-weaving, a sliding bar carrying needles, each with a separate thread, for producing the pattern. The bar is raised and lowered as required by the action on it of a wheel grooved according to the pattern to be produced. Sometimes two or more such bars are employed simultaneously. The device is a somewhat old one, still much used in Scotland. A. Barlow, Weaving, p. 188.

lappet-head (lap′et-hed), n. A head-dress made with lappets or lace pendants.

He beheld his . . . friend dressed up in a lappet-head and petticoat.
Goldsmith, Voltaire.

And sails with lappet-head and mincing airs
Duly at chink of bell to morning pray'rs.
Cowper, Truth, l. 139.

lappet-weaving (lap′et-wē″ving), n. A system of weaving used for producing figures on the surface of cloth by means of needles placed in a sliding frame. A. Barlow, Weaving, p. 188.

Lappic (lap′ik), a. and n. [< Lapp + -ic.] Same as Lappish.

lapping[1] (lap′ing), n. [Verbal n. of lap[1], v.] 1. The act of licking up with the tongue.—2. The motion and sound of rippling water.

lapping[2] (lap′ing), n. [Verbal n. of lap[3], v.] 1. The act of wrapping or folding.—2. The act of superimposing the margin of a piece of any material upon the margin of another piece, as in making a lap-joint.—3. In textile manuf., the process of forming a lap or fleece of fibrous material suitable for presentation or delivery to the carding-machine. In cotton-manufacture the laps are formed by compacting the cotton upon rollers, whence the fleece is detached after it has acquired the proper thickness. Laps are also formed by uniting slivers, as in the preparation of tow for spinning.

4. In ordnance, a process for slightly increasing the bore of a rifled gun by wearing away the lands, or metal between the rifle-grooves.—5. In metal-working, the smoothing of metal surfaces by rubbing them with a plate of metal rendered abrasive by the application of oil and powdered corundum, or by the application of a revolving disk similarly prepared.—6. That which is lapped; a flap or pendant.

As those casual lappings and flowing streamers were imitated from nothing, they seldom have any folds or chiaro scuro. Walpole, Anecdotes of Painting, IV. i.

lapping-engine (lap′ing-en″jin), n. In metal-working, a machine for turning over the two laps which are later joined by the operation of welding.

lapping-machine (lap′ing-ma-shēn″), n. Same as lapper[2], 2.

Lappish (lap′ish), a. and n. [= Sw. Lappsk = Dan. Lappisk; as Lapp + -ish[1].] I. a. Pertaining to Lapland or the Lapps.

II. n. The language of the Lapps, which is akin to the Finnic.

Also Lappic.

lap-plate (lap′plāt), n. In metal-working, a plate which covers the line or joint where two other plates abut against each other, and is soldered, riveted, or bolted to both, thus connecting them.

Lapponian (la-pō′ni-an), a. [< ML. Lapponia, Lapland: see Lapp.] Same as Lappish.

lapp-owl (lap′oul), n. The great gray owl, Strix lapponica, of Lapland and other northerly regions.

lappy† (lap′i), a. [< lap[1] + -y[1].] In liquor; drunk. Bailey, 1731. [Cant.]

lap-ring (lap′ring), n. An open ring in which the ends overlap each other without touching. It is analogous to a split-ring, and, like it, is used to form a convenient connecting-link. The lap-ring, however, is made of such heavy material that it cannot, like the split-ring, be elastic. E. H. Knight.

lap-robe (lap′rōb), n. A fur robe or a blanket used to protect the feet and legs when riding in a carriage or sleigh. [U. S.]

lap-roller (lap′rō″lėr), n. In cotton-manuf., the roller of a lapping-machine which receives the fiber after the processes of batting and scutching, and upon which the lap or fleece is built up and compacted to a thickness suitable for delivery to the carding-machine.

lapsable (lap′sa-bl), a. [< lapse + -able.] Capable of lapsing, falling, or relapsing.

Lapsana, Lampsana (lap′-, lamp′sa-nä), n. [NL. Lapsana (Linnæus), Lampsana (Tournefort), < L. lapsana, lampsana, < Gr. λαψάνη, λαμψάνη, the charlock.] A genus of plants belonging to the family Cichoriaceæ, type of the subtribe Lapsaneæ, having a glabrous involucre and naked receptacle, oblong, somewhat compressed, many-ribbed achenes, small, loosely panicled heads, and yellow corollas. About nine very closely related species occur, widely distributed throughout the northern hemisphere in the old world, one of them also occurring in North America. They are annual erect, branching herbs, sometimes hairy or glandular-viscid, with coarsely toothed or pinnatifid leaves, and long-peduncled heads. L. communis, the nipplewort, is a common hedge-weed in Europe, and occurs in the United States and Canada, probably only naturalized.

Lapsaneæ, Lampsaneæ (lap-, lamp-sā′nē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Lapsana, Lampsana, + -eæ.] A subtribe of plants of the family Cichoriaceæ, typified by the genus Lapsana, and containing also the genera Hispidella and Serinia, annual leafy herbs with chiefly naked involucres of nearly equal scales, and glabrous achenes, obtuse or rounded at the apex.

lap-scale (lap′skāl), n. An apparatus used in weighing out the quantity of wool or cotton which is to be spread upon the feeding-apron of a lapper or a carding-machine. E. H. Knight.

lapse (laps), n. [= F. laps = Sp. Pg. lapso = It. lasso, < L. lapsus, a falling, slipping, < labi, slip: see labent, lap[2].] 1. A falling; a continued falling off or away; a passing or gliding along or away: as, the lapse of flowing water; the lapse of time.

About me round I saw
Hill, dale, and shady woods, and sunny plains,
And languid lapse of murmuring streams.
Milton, P. L., viii. 263.

Through the still lapse of ages.
Bryant, Thanatopsis.

2. A gradual fall or descent; passage downward, physical or moral; a passing from a higher to a lower place, state, or condition: as, a lapse from integrity; a lapse into sin.

Since thy original lapse, true liberty Is lost. Milton, P. L., xii. 83.

The lapse to indolence is soft and imperceptible, but the return to diligence is difficult. Johnson, Rambler.

With soft and silent lapse came down
The glory that the wood receives,
At sunset, in its golden leaves.
Longfellow, Burial of the Minnisink.

3. A failure or miscarriage through some fault, slip, or negligence; hence, a slip or fault in general; a mistake from carelessness or inattention: as, a lapse of justice; a lapse of title to an estate; a lapse of the tongue or of grammar.

His [Adrian's] whole time was a very restoration of all the lapses and decays of former times.
Bacon, Advancement of Learning, i. 78.

Let us stand never so much upon our guard, there will be lapses, there will be inadvertencies, there will be surprises. Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. iv.

4. In Eng. eccles. law, the failure or omission of a patron to present a clerk to a benefice within the time allowed him, six months from avoidance, in which event the benefice is said to be lapsed or in lapse, and the right of presentation passes to the bishop.

The canon was made for presentation within six months, and title of lapse given to the bishop.
Selden, Illustrations of Drayton's Polyolbion, viii.

★ lapse (laps), v.; pret. and pp. lapsed, ppr. lapsing. [< L. lapsare, fall, slip, stumble, freq. of labi, pp. lapsus, fall, slip: see lapse, n. Cf. collapse, elapse, illapse, relapse.] I. intrans. 1. To fall; slip; slide; glide; sink; pass slowly, silently, or by degrees.

This disposition to shorten our words by retrenching the vowels is nothing else but a tendency to lapse into the barbarity of those northern nations from which we descended. Swift, To the Lord Treasurer.

2. To slip in conduct; fail in duty; deviate from rectitude; commit a fault; slip or fall into error or sin.

To lapse in fulness
Is sorer than to lie for need.
Shak., Cymbeline, iii. 6. 12.

3. To fall or pass from one proprietor to another, by the omission, negligence, or failure of some one, as a patron, a legatee, etc.

If the archbishop shall not fill it up within six months ensuing, it lapses to the king. Ayliffe, Parergon.

4. To pass or fall away; fail; specifically, in law, to become ineffectual or void: as, the benefice lapsed; the legacy lapsed.

Until in time his history shall lapse and be forgotten.
R. D. Blackmore, Lorna Doone, p. 277.

The lapsed, in early church hist., those who, having professed Christianity, denied the faith in time of persecution or fell into some other kind of sin, such as offering sacrifice or incense to idols, etc. On profession of contrition they were allowed to hope for restoration to the church, but, before being again admitted to communion, had to pass a long probation, and submit to special penances, sometimes lasting till the approach of death.

II. trans. To cause or suffer to slide; suffer to fail or become void or ineffectual; let slip. [Rare.]

He counts the living his to dispose, not to make profit of. He fears more to lapse his conscience than his living.
Fuller.

lap-shaver (lap'shā″vėr), n. A machine for reducing leather-hides to a uniform thickness by shaving away inequalities by means of a set knife. The name comes from the old practice of shaving hides by hand while held on a board in the lap. E. H. Knight.

lap-sided (lap'sī″ded), a. Same as lop-sided.

lap-stone (lap'stōn), n. A stone held in the lap on which shoemakers hammer leather to make it more solid.

lapstreak (lap'strēk), a. and n. I. a. Built with each streak or course of planking overlapping the one below it like clapboards on a house; clincher-built: applied to boats.

II. n. A boat built in this way.

This boat . . . was a lapstreak, some thirty-seven feet long. The Boston Globe, Nov. 7, 1886.

Five six-oared shells, two six-oared lapstreaks.
Forest and Stream, Sept. 25, 1873, p. 108.

lapstreaked (lap'strēkt), a. Same as lapstreak.

lapstreaker (lap'strē-kėr), n. A fisherman who uses a lapstreak boat. [New England.]

lapsus (lap'sus), n.; pl. lapsus. [L., a fall, slip: see lapse, n.] A fall or slide; a slip: only as a Latin word.—Lapsus calami, a slip of the pen; a mistake in writing.—Lapsus linguæ, a slip of the tongue; a mistake of a word in utterance.—Lapsus memoriæ, a slip of the memory.

lap-table (lap'tā″bl), n. Same as lap-board.

lap-tea (lap'tē), n. A tea at which refreshments are served to the guests (who are not seated at table) to be held in their laps. Lowell, Biglow Papers, Int. [Local, U. S.]

Laputan (la-pū'tan), a. and n. [< Laputa (see def.) + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to Laputa, an imaginary flying island described in Swift's "Gulliver's Travels," whose inhabitants were engaged in all sorts of ridiculous projects; hence, chimerical; absurd; ridiculous; impossible.

After all Swift's idea of extracting sunbeams out of cucumbers, which he attributes to his Laputan philosophers, may not be so very absurd.
Sir J. Herschel, Pop. Lects., p. 62.

II. n. An inhabitant of Laputa; a visionary.

lap-weld (lap'weld), n. A welding or weld made by lapping one piece of metal over another before hammering: distinguished from butt-weld.

lapweld (lap'weld), v. t. To weld together by ★ the lapping of one edge over the other.

lapwing (lap'wing), n. [Early mod. E. lappewing, < ME. lapwing, a corrupt form, simulating wing ("because he laps or claps the wings so often"—Minsheu), of lapwink, lapwynke, lappewinke, lapwyncke, prop. lepewinke*, leepwynke, < AS. hleápewince, a lapwing, < hleápan, leap, run, + wince*, < wincan*, move aside, turn: see wink, wince. The name appar. refers to the bird's irregular, twitching mode of flight.] A plover-like bird with four toes, a crest, and lustrous plumage, belonging to the genus Vanellus and family Charadriidæ. The best-known lapwing is V. cristatus, a common European bird, also called pewit, from its cry. The adult male has the upper parts iridescent with green, violet, and purplish tints, the under parts white, a large area on the breast and the top of the head and the long crest black, the tail-coverts chestnut or orange-brown, the tail black and white, the bill black, and the feet red. It is about as large as a pigeon. The eggs are esteemed a great luxury, and many are annually sent to the London markets from the marshy districts of England, under the name of plovers' eggs. There are other species. Also called flopwing.

Lapwing (Vanellus cristatus).

For anone after he was chaunged,
And from his owne kinde straunged,
A lapwynke made he was.
Gower, Conf. Amant., v.

Wherein you resemble the lapwing, who crieth most where her nest is not. Lyly, Alexander and Campaspe, ii. 2.

lapwinkt, n. An obsolete form of lapwing.

lapwork (lap'wėrk), n. In metal-working, work in which parts are fastened together by being lapped one over the other and then riveted, lapwelded, or the like.

laquayt, laqueyt, n. Obsolete forms of lackey, Minsheu, 1617.

laquear (lak'wē-ăr), n. [L., also laqueare, a paneled ceiling; cf. lacunar, of same sense: see lacunar.] A ceiling which consists of sunk or hollowed compartments having bands or spaces between. See lacunar[1].

Lar[1] (lär), n.; pl. Lares (lā'rēz), or, as English, Lars (lärz). [< L. Lar, usually in pl. Lares, OL. Lases (Etruscan Laran, Lalan), perhaps akin to Skt. √las, shine.] 1. In Rom. antiq., one of a class of infernal deities whose cult was of primitive origin. They were looked upon as natural protectors of the state and family, and also as powerful for evil if not duly respected and propitiated. The public Lares, originally two in number, were the guardians of the unity of the state, and were honored with temples and an elaborate public ceremonial. After the time of Augustus, at least, each division of the city had also its own public Lares (Lares compitales). The private Lares differed for each family, and were worshiped daily in the house, being domiciled either on the family hearth or in a special shrine. They received also especial recognition upon every occasion of festivity, public or private, and on certain days devoted particularly to them, and claimed tribute alike from the bride upon entering the family and from the youth upon attaining his majority. The chief of the private Lares in each family, the domestic or household Lar (Lar familiaris) in the fullest sense, was the spirit of the founder of the family. To the family spirits were often added in later times, among the household Lares, the shades of heroes, or other personalities who were looked upon with admiration or awe. In their character as malignant divinities, the Lares were commonly classed under the titles of lemures or larvæ.

In consecrated earth,
And on the holy hearth,
The Lars and Lemures moan with midnight plaint.
Milton, Nativity, l. 191.

Hence—2. One of the most cherished possessions of a family or household; one of the household gods. Compare Penates, in a like use.

So shall each youth, assisted by our eyes, . . .
Be rich in ancient brass [coins], though not in gold,
And keep his Lares, though his house be sold.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 366.

You were my wonders, you my Lars,
In darkling days my sun and stars.
Lowell, Oracle of the Goldfishes.

3. [l. c.] The white-handed gibbon, Hylobates lar. See Hylobates.—4. pl. [NL.] A group of lepidopterous insects.—5. [NL.] A genus of gymnoblastic or tubularian hydroids, type of the family Hydrolaridæ.

Lar[2] (lär), n. [< L. Lar or Lars (Lart-), < Etruscan Larth, lord.] Lord: a title prefixed to Etruscan names, properly distinctive of the eldest son, and often mistaken for an integral part of the name. Also Lars.

Appraised the Lycian custom, spoke of those That lay at wine with Lar and Lucumo.
Tennyson, Princess, ii.

Lars Porsena of Clusium,
By the nine gods he swore
That the great house of Tarquin
Should suffer wrong no more.
Macaulay, Horatius.

Laramie group. See group[1].

lararium (lā-rā'ri-um), n.; pl. lararia (-ä). [L., < Lar, a household deity: see Lar[1].] Among the ancient Romans, a small shrine in private houses where the Lares were kept and worshiped.

larboard (lär'bōrd; by sailors, lab'ėrd), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also larboord (also leereboord, in connection with and accommodated to steereboord, starboard); prob., with irreg. alteration of d to r by assimilation of the form to that of the associated starboard, < ME. laddeborde, latheborde, latebord, perhaps lit. the 'lading-side' (the side on which, in the absence of any reason to the contrary, the cargo is received), < lade, a load, lit. a carrying (confused with the unrelated verb lade, < AS. hladan, lade), + bord, board, side: see lade[2], lade[1], load[1], load[2], and board. The AS. term was bæcbord: see etym. of backboard. It is not clear why this term, which remains in other Teut. tongues, gave way in E. to larboard. Cf. starboard (ult. < AS. steórbord, < steór, steer, rudder, + bord, side). The supposition that larboard stands for lower-board*, i. e. left side (D. laager, lower, left; cf. E. obs. higher, right), is untenable; and the statement that larboard and starboard are derived, respectively, from the (supposed) It. terms quella borda, 'that side,' questa borda, 'this side,' is gross nonsense.] I. n. Naut., that side of a ship which is on the left hand of a person facing the bow: opposed to starboard, the right-hand side. The term is now obsolescent, the word port having been officially substituted in order to avoid confusion, in hearing orders, with the opposite but like-sounding starboard. Since July, 1913, the words right and left, instead of starboard and port, have been used in the United States navy in referring to movements of the rudder. See port[4].

Thay layden in on laddeborde and the lofe wynnes.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), iii. 106.

All the way vpon his leerebord was the maine ocean.
Hakluyt's Voyages, p. 5.

II. a. Of or pertaining to the left-hand side of a ship; port: as, the larboard quarter.—Larboard boat, or larboard quarter-boat, the mate's boat of a whaler.

larbowlines (lär'bō″linz or -līnz), n. [< lar(board) + bowlines.] Naut., the men of the larboard watch. See watch.

larcener (lär'se-nėr), n. [< larcen-y + -er[1].] One who commits larceny; a thief.

larcenist (lär'se-nist), n. [< larcen-y + -ist.] Same as larcener.

larcenous (lär'sē-nus), a. [< larcen-y + -ous.] Thievish; pertaining to, characterized by, or tainted with larceny.

The acquittal of any noble and official thief will not fail to diffuse the most heartfelt satisfaction over the larcenous and burglarious world.
Sydney Smith, Peter Plymley's Letters, iv.

larcenously (lär'sē-nus-li), adv. In a larcenous or thievish manner; thievishly.

larceny (lär'sē-ni), n. [Formerly also larciny; with added suffix -y, prob. to conform the word to burglary, felony, etc.; earlier larcen*, larson, < OF. larrecin, larcin, F. larcin = Sp. Pg. It. latrocinio, < L. latrocinium (> E. latrociny), robbery, < latrocinari, practise freebooting or highway robbery, < latro, a hired servant, a mercenary, a freebooter, robber. Cf. Gr. λάτρις, a hired servant.] In law, the wrongful or fraudulent taking and carrying away, by any person and from any place, of the mere personal goods of another, with a felonious intent to convert them to the taker's own use, and make them his own property, without the consent of the owner; theft. East. According to some recent authorities, conversion with felonious intent may be larceny although there was no intent to appropriate the thing to the use of the thief himself. At common law appropriation by an employee or bailee already in lawful possession was not larceny, but at most embezzlement. By modern statute, in several jurisdictions acts formerly amounting only to embezzlement have been made larceny.

Larciny, or theft, by contraction for latrociny, latrocinium, is distinguished by the law into two sorts.
Blackstone, Com., IV. xvii.

Compound larceny. See simple larceny.—Grand larceny, larceny of property having a value equal to or more than a certain amount, which the common law in England fixes at 12*d.*, and which is fixed in some parts of the United States at $25, in others at $50.—Petty larceny, larceny of property having a value less than that fixed in the case of grand larceny.—Simple larceny, larceny uncombined with any circumstances of aggravation, such as being committed by the owner's clerks or servants, or from the person: when so combined, it is called compound larceny. Robbery is larceny combined with assault, and is thus compound larceny.

larch (lärch), n. [Early mod. E. larche, < OF. larege, larice = Sp. lárice = Pg. larico = It. larice = MD. lercken(boom), D. lorken(boom) = OHG. larihha*, MHG. larche, lērche, G. lerche, lärche (lerchenbaum) = Dan. lærke, lærke(træ) = Sw. lärk(träd), < L. larix (laric-), < Gr. λάριξ (λάρικ-), larch. The W. llars-wydden, llar-wydden (gwydden, tree) is after E. The mod. F. name is mélèze.] Any coniferous tree of the genus Larix. The common larch of Europe, L. decidua, is native in the Alps and their vicinity, and is frequently cultivated in England lariat (lar'i-at), n. [< Sp. la reata, < la, the, + reata, a rope used to tie horses and other animals together: see reata.] 1. A rope or cord used for picketing horses while grazing.—2. A thong or noose used for catching wild animals; a lasso. Also called reata (erroneously spelled riata). [Western U. S.]

The rope, whether leather lariat or made of grass, is the one essential feature of every cowboy's equipment. Loosely coiled, it hangs from the horn or is tied to one side of the saddle in front of the thigh, and is used for every conceivable emergency.
T. Roosevelt, Ranch Life and the Hunting Trail, p. 16.

larid (lar'id) n. A bird of the family Laridæ.

Laridæ (lar'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Larus + -idæ.] A family of long-winged, web-footed swimming birds, with a small free hind toe, and pervious lateral non-tubular nostrils, belonging to the order Longipennes and suborder Gaviæ; the gull family. This family includes upward of 125 species, found in every part of the world, of fluviatile, lacustrine, and maritime habits. They are strong and buoyant fliers, subsist on fish, insects, and other animal food, and rear the young in the nest, which they usually build on the ground, laying two or three heavily blotched eggs. The prevailing color is snowy-white with a pearly-blue mantle. The Laridæ present four types, usually made the basis of division into as many subfamilies: Lestridinæ, the jägers or skuagulls; Larinæ, gulls proper; Sterninæ, terns or sea-swallows; and Rhynchopinæ, skimmers. See these words, and cuts under Chroïcocephalus, gull, ivory-gull, etc.

larin (lar'in), n. [Pers. lārī, < Lar, in Persia.] A money of Persia and Arabia, consisting of metal wire about the size of a quill bent into a hook, and bearing the name of the reigning monarch. The old larins were worth intrinsically about 20 cents in silver; but later disk-shaped bronze coins of this name were struck, the nominal value of which varied from half a United States cent to 2 cents. See hook-money.

Larinæ (lą-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Larus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Laridæ, having the bill more or less strongly epignathous, with continuous covering, and the tail usually square and of moderate length; the gulls. Some of the smaller species closely resemble terns, but the hooking of the bill is usually distinctive. The Larinæ are cosmopolitan, abounding on most sea-coasts and large inland waters. They are noisy voracious birds, subsisting chiefly on fish. The number of species is variously reckoned at from 50 to 75. The leading genera are Larus, Pagophila, Rissa, Chroïcocephalus, Rhodostethia, and Xema. See gull[2].

larine (lar'in), a. Pertaining to the Larinæ, or having their characters.

Larix (lar'iks), n. [NL. (P. Miller, 1731), < L. larix, larch: see larch.] A genus of coniferous trees with needle-shaped deciduous leaves; the larches. It belongs to the tribe Abieteæ with the pines, true cedars, spruces, and firs, from all of which it is distinguished by its deciduous leaves, which are densely subverticillate-fasciculate in the scaly bud. The reflexed cones are provided with persistent scales, each subtended by a conspicuous bract. There are about 9 species, inhabiting Europe, Asia, and North America. (See larch.) Four fossil species have been described from Germany and Austria and one from Manitoba.

lark[1] (lärk), n. [< ME. larke, contr. of laverock, laverok, laverokke (> E. dial. laverock, lavrock, leverock, laarick), < AS. lāferce, lāwerce, earlier lāwerce, lāwerce, lāuricae, lāurice = Fries. liurke = D. lewerik, leeuwrik, leeuwerik, leeuwerk = MLG. lēwerike, lēwerke, LG. lewerke = OHG lēwarahha*, lērahhā, lērehhā, lērihhā, MHG. lēwreche, lēwerich, lēwerech, lēwerch, lēreche, G. lerche, G. dial. löweneckerche = Icel. lævirki = OSw. lærikia, Sw. lärka = Dan. lærke, a lark. Origin unknown; the older forms have the semblance of a contracted compound, but no satisfactory explanation of it appears.] 1. A small oscine passerine bird of the family Alaudidæ. Larks are mostly insectivorous migratory birds of Europe, Asia, and Africa, the only true larks found in the western hemisphere being those of the genus Eremophila, excepting the occasional occurrence of the skylark as a straggler. Africa is the richest in species. They are chiefly birds of the open country; they nest on the ground, and some are famous for soaring and singing. About 100 species are described, leading genera of which are Eremophila, Alauda, Melanocorypha, Cerhilauda, Mirafra, Megalophonus, and Pyrrhulauda. The few species which are well known are generally distinguished by qualifying prefixes: as, the skylark, Alauda arvensis; the wood-lark, Alauda arborea; the shore-lark, Eremophila alpestris. See the compounds, and cuts under Alauda, Eremophila, and skylark.

Then perted the pepull, presit to there hold,
And loget the long night till the larke sang.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 10000.

Hark, hark! the lark at heaven's gate sings,
And Phœbus 'gins arise.
Shak., Cymbeline, ii. 3 (song).

2. A bird like or likened to a lark, but not one of the Alaudidæ: with a distinguishing prefix: as, the titlark, meadow-lark, bunting-lark, bush-lark, horse-lark, etc. Such birds are chiefly the titlarks or pipits (see Anthus), and various kinds of finches and buntings.—Dusky lark, the rock-pipit, Anthus obscurus.—Horned lark, a bird of the family Alaudidæ, Eremophila alpestris, closely related to the true larks, but distinguished by the development of feathers into a horn-like tuft on the head: common to northern Europe and America.—Rock-lark, the rock-pipit, Anthus obscurus.—Sea-lark. (a) The rock-pipit. (b) A kind of sandpiper.—White or white-winged lark, the snow-bunting. [Eng. (Norfolk).]

larme[1]†, n. [By apheresis from alarm.] An alarum. Palsgrave.

larme[2] (lärm), n. [F., a tear, < L. lacrima, a tear: see lacrymal.] 1. A rounded form having a point, and supposed to resemble a teardrop, as in a pattern of lace.—2. In her., the representation of a tear—that is, a drop argent. See gutté.

larmier (lär'miėr), n. [< F. larmier, < larme, a tear: see larme.] 1. In arch., another name for the corona; also, any horizontal member or string-course similar in profile to a corona, Larmiers. A, Greek; B, C, medieval.

projecting from the face of a wall to throw off rain which would otherwise trickle down. Such larmiers are especially common in medieval architecture.—2. In zoöl., the tear-bag; a subcutaneous sebaceous gland or follicle of sundry ruminants, as the Cervidæ or deer, situated under the skin below each eye, and opening upon the cheek near the inner corner of the eye to discharge its viscid secretion. It is not a lacrymal gland, but of the nature of Meibomian and other sebaceous follicles, which exude an unctuous and usually odorous substance.

laroid (lar'oid), a. [< Larus + -oid.] Pertaining to the Laroideæ, or having their characters; laridine.

Laroideæ (lā-roi'dē-ē), n. pl. The Laridæ rated as a superfamily, divided into Stercorariidæ (the jägers) and Laridæ.

Larra (lar'ą), n. [NL. (Fabricius).] A genus of fossorial hymenopterous insects of the family Sphegidæ, type of the subfamily Larrinæ. It is characterized by the truncate marginal cell, the non-emarginate eyes, three submarginal cells of which the second is petiolate, and the elongate metathorax truncate behind and parallel-sided. These wasps generally burrow in the ground, but a Brazilian one makes a nest of the woolly scrapings of plants. L. semirufa has a black head and thorax and reddish abdomen, and preys on the Rocky Mountain locust (Melanoplus spretus), and probably on other grasshoppers.

Larrada (lar'ą-dą), n. [NL.] A form of the word Larra, recently in current usage among entomologists, proposed by Leach, 1817.

Larrea (lar'ē-ą), n. [NL. (Cavanilles), named after J. A. H. de Larrea, a Spanish patron of art and science.] An untenable name for Covillea, a genus of evergreen shrubs of tropical and subtropical America, of the family Zygophyllaceæ. It is distinguished botanically from Guaiacum and other related genera by its sessile ovary, its hairy a, leaf, showing nervation; b, flower; c, flower cut longitudinally through the pistil, and showing two introrse stamens; d, stamen, seen from without; e, fruit.

Branch of Creosote-bush (Covillea tridentata), with flowers and fruit.

indehiscent fruit, and its bifoliate or abruptly pinnate leaves, the leaflets being often connate. There are five known species, natives of Texas, Mexico, southern Brazil, and the Andes. They are unpleasantly odorous balsamiferous shrubs, with knotty two-ranked branches, opposite leaves, persistent stipules, and yellow flowers solitary on short, terminal, interstipular peduncles. C. tridentata is the creosote-bush of Mexico and the arid plains of the southwestern United States.

larrick (lar'ik), a. [Origin obscure.] Careless. [Prov. Eng.]

larrikin (lar'i-kin), n. and a. [Also larikin; origin unrecorded. On its face the word looks like Larry, a common Irish reduction of Lawrence, + -kin. The tale quoted below was evidently invented to supply an etymology.]

He [James Dalton, a Melbourne police-sergeant of Irish birth] will be best remembered as the originator of the now universally adopted word larrikin. "They were a-larrikin (larking) down the strate, your worship," said he one day, in describing the conduct of some youths, and . . . the expression . . . passed into a catch-word.
N. and Q., 7th ser., VII. 345.

I. n. A rowdy; a rough; a blackguard; a "hoodlum" [Australia.]

A larrikin is a cross between the street Arab and the hoodlum, with a dash of the rough thrown in to improve the mixture. Arch. Forbes, quoted in Echoes, April 4, 1884.

II. a. Rowdy.

Such a larrikin phrase as "O crimini" is to be found at least once in his writings. Literary Era, II. 165.

larrikinism (lar'i-kin-izm), n. [< larrikin + -ism.] The conduct of a larrikin. [Colloq.]

Larrinæ (la-rī'nē), n. pl [NL., < Larra + -inæ.] A small subfamily of fossorial hymenopters of the family Sphegidæ, typified by the genus Larra or Larrada. They are of small size and slender form, with narrowly ovoid abdomen, concealed labrum, notched mandibles, and a spine at the base of the middle tibiæ.

larrup (lar'up), v. t.; pret. and pp. larruped or larrupped, ppr. larruping or larrupping. [Prob. < D. larpen, thresh with flails; cf. larp, a lash. The E. form larrup (for larp*) may represent the strongly rolled r of the D.: so larum, alarum, for alarm.] To flog; thrash. [Colloq. slang.]

There was no rope-dancing for me; I danced on the bare ground, and was larruped with the rope.
Dickens, Hard Times, v.

larry (lar'i), n. Same as lorry.

Lars (lärz), n. Same as Lar[2].

larson†, n. See larceny. Bailey, 1731.

larum (lar'um or lär'um), n. [Abbr. of alarum = alarm.] 1. Alarm; a warning sound; a noise giving notice of danger. [Obsolete or poetical.]

The wailefull warre in time doth yeelde to peace,
The larums lowde and trumpete sounde doth cease.
Turberville, After Misadventures come Good Haps.

And the first larum of the cock's shrill throat
May prove a trumpet, summoning your ear
To horrid sounds of hostile feet within.
Cowper, Task, iv. 569.

2†. An alarm-clock or alarm-watch.

Of this nature likewise was the larum mentioned by Walchius, which, though it were but two or three inches big, yet would both wake a man and of itself light a candle for him, at any set hour of the night.
Bp. Wilkins, Dædalus, iii.

larum†(lar'um or lär'um), v. t. [< larum, n.] To alarm, frighten, or warn with noise.

Down, down they larum, with impetuous whirl,
The Pindars and the Miltons of a curl.
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 163.

Larus (lā'rus), n. [NL., < LL. larus, < Gr. λάρος, a ravenous sea-bird.] A genus of Laridæ; the gulls proper. The name formerly covered most of the family; it is now usually restricted to species of large size, with square tail, hooked bill, normal hallux, and mostly white plumage, with a colored mantle and without a colored hood. L. canus is the common mew-gull or seamew of Europe, etc. L. argentatus is the herring-gull. L. marinus is the great black-backed gull. L. glaucus is the ice-gull or burgomaster. See gull, mew-gull, etc., and ★cuts under gull, herring-gull, and burgomaster.

larva (lär'vä), n.; pl. larvæ (-vē). [Also rarely larve (in def. 2); = D. G. Dan. larve = Sw. larv (< F.); = F. larve = Sp. Pg. It. larva, < NL. larva, larva, < L. larva, a ghost, specter, mask, skeleton.] 1. In Rom. myth., a ghost; a specter; a shade: generally in the plural. Compare Lar[1], 1.

The dead were powerful also to do harm, unless they were duly propitiated with all the proper rites; they were spirits of terror as well as of good: in this fearful sense the names Lemures and still more Larvæ were appropriated to them. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 313.

2. In zoöl.: (a) The early form of any animal which during its development is unlike its parent: thus the tadpole, the larva of the frog, is unlike the frog. It is most familiar as the name for an insect in the caterpillar or grub state; the first stage after the egg in the metamorphoses of insects, preceding the pupa or chrysalis; the first condition of an insect at its issuing from the egg, when it is usually in the form of a grub, caterpillar, or maggot. The term was applied by Linnæus in the sense that the larval stage of an insect masks or hides the true character or imago of the species. It was long only or chiefly an entomological term, but is now commonly extended to other animals than insects, and especially other arthropods which undergo transformation. See pupa, imago, and cuts under Asteroidea, Cirripedia, Diptera, glass-crab, hag-moth, Holothuroidea, and house-fly. (b) [cap.] A genus of mollusks. Humphreys, 1797. (c) [cap.] A genus of birds: same as Alca. Vieillot, 1816.—Cornute larva. See cornute.—Larva of Lovèn, or Lovèn's larva, the larval form of an oceanic archiannelid worm, Polygordius: so called before the adult had been discovered. See Polygordius, Archiannelida.—Larva pupigera, a puparium (which see).—Painter's-easel larva. See Pluteus.—Rat-tailed larva, a larva of certain flies of the family Syrphidæ, as the drone-fly, which has the anal end of the body greatly prolonged into a spiracle-bearing tail.

larvæform (lär'vē-fôrm), a. An erroneous variant of larviform.

larval (lär'val), a. [= Sp. Pg. larval, < L. larvalis, pertaining to a ghost (NL. pertaining to a larva); < larva, a ghost: see larva.] Of or pertaining to a larva; characteristic of larvæ: as, larval character; larval habits.

The magpie moth . . . attacks in its larval state plums, apricots, and even the sloe and the blackthorn.
Edinburgh Rev., CLXIV. 361.

Larval generation, parthenogenesis.

Larvalia (lär-vā'li-ä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of larvalis: see larval.] One of two classes of tunicates or ascidians (the other being Saccata), considered as a branch of vertebrates under the name Urochorda (which see). The Larvalia consist of the Appendiculariæ, or those ascidians which retain the urochord throughout life. E. R. Lankester.

larvarium (lär-vā'ri-um), n.; pl. larvariums, larvaria (-umz, -ä). [NL., < larva + -arium.] 1. In entom., a shelter of leaves, silk, or other material constructed by a caterpillar, into which it retreats when not feeding.—2. An entomological hatching-house; a place or appliance for rearing insects.

Larvarium, in which to hatch moths and butterflies.
Tuthill, New York Daily Times, May, 1859.

larvate (lär'vāt), a. [= F. larvé = Pg. larvado = It. larvato, masked, < NL. larvatus, masked (cf. L. larvatus, pp. of larvare, bewitch), < L. larva, a ghost, mask: see larva.] Masked; clothed as with a mask.

larvated (lär'vā-ted), a. [< larvate + -ed[2].] Same as larvate: sometimes applied to certain diseases when their ordinary characters are masked or concealed, as typhoid fever. Quain.

larve (lärv), n. and a. [< F. larve, larva: see larva.] I. n. Same as larva. [Rare.]

II. a. Same as larval. [Rare.]

larviform (lär'vi-fôrm), a. [< NL. larva, a larva (see larva), + L. forma, form.] 1. Resembling a larva.—2. Larval in form or structure; being a larva, as a grub, maggot, or ★caterpillar.

larvigerous (lär-vij'e-rus), a. [< NL. larva, a larva (see larva), + L. gerere, carry.] Bearing a larval skin, as the pupæ of Diptera.

When ready to change into the larvigerous pupæ they [maggots of the bot-fly] dislodge themselves and crawl out or are ejected by the animal in coughing.
Stand. Nat. Hist., II. 428.

Larvipara (lär-vip'a-rä), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of larviparus: see larviparous.] Insects which bring forth larvæ instead of eggs.

larviparous (lär-vip'a-rus), a. [< NL. larviparus, < larva, larva, + L. parere, bring forth.] Bringing forth larvæ; giving birth to young which have already passed from the egg to the larval stage; producing maggots ovoviviparously, as the common blow-fly.

larvivorous (lär-viv'ō-rus), a. [< NL. larva, larva, + L. vorare, devour.] Devouring larvæ; feeding on grubs, caterpillars, and the like; erucivorous.

laryngeal (lā-rin'jē-al), a. and n. [< larynx (laryng-) + -e-al.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the larynx: as, laryngeal vessels, nerves, muscles, etc.; laryngeal sounds.

II. n. A laryngeal nerve or artery.—Inferior laryngeal, recurrent laryngeal, a branch of the pneumogastric nerve which reaches the larynx after winding around a large artery: on the right side of the body, around the subclavian; on the left, around the arch of the aorta.—Superior laryngeal, a branch of the pneumogastric nerve which passes direct through the thyrohyoid membrane to the larynx.

laryngean (lā-rin'jē-an), a. [< larynx (laryng-) + -e-an.] Same as laryngeal. [Rare.]

laryngectomic (lar"in-jek-tom'ik), a. [< laryngectom-y + -ic.] Pertaining to laryngectomy.

laryngectomy (lar-in-jek'tō-mi), n. [< Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + ἐκτομή, a cutting out (< ἐκ, out, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut).] The excision of the larynx.

larynges, n. Latin plural of larynx.

laryngismal (lar-in-jis'mal), a. [< NL. laryngism(us) + -al.] Pertaining to or characterized by laryngismus.

Tracheotomy in laryngismal epilepsy.
Encyc. Brit., XI. 390.

laryngismus (lar-in-jis'mus), n. [NL., in form as if < Gr. λαρυγγισμός, a shouting (< λαρυγγίζειν, shout, bawl, < λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx), but in sense directly < larynx (laryng-) + -ismus, E. -ism: see larynx.] Spasm of the glottis, causing contraction or closure of the opening.—Laryngismus stridulus, spasm of the glottis occurring independently of local trouble, usually associated with rickets, a disease for the most part of young children. Also called thymic asthma, Kopp's asthma, Millar's asthma.

laryngitic (lar-in-jit'ik), a. [< laryngitis + -ic.] ★Pertaining to or of the nature of laryngitis.

laryngitis (lar-in-jī'tis), n. [NL., < Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + -itis.] Inflammation of the larynx.

laryngo-fissure (lā-ring"gō-fish'ūr), n. [< Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + L. fissura, a cleaving, fissure: see fissure.] In surg., the division of the thyroid cartilage.

laryngological (lā-ring-gō-loj'i-kal), a. [< laryngology + -ic-al.] Of or pertaining to laryngology.

laryngologist (lar-ing-gol'ō-jist), n. [< laryngology + -ist.] One versed in laryngology.

laryngology (lar-ing-gol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] The science of the larynx; a treatise on the larynx and its diseases.

laryngophony (lar-ing-gof'ō-ni), n. [< Gr. λαρυγγόφωνος, sounding from the throat, < λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), throat, larynx, + φωνή, sound.] The sound of the voice as heard through the stethoscope applied over the larynx.

laryngophthisis (lā-ring-gō-tī'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + φθίσις, consumption: see phthisis.] In pathol., tuberculosis of the larynx.

laryngorrhea, laryngorrhœa (lā-ring-gō-rē'ä), n. [NL., < Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + ῥοία, a flow, < ῥεῖν, flow.] In pathol., excessive secretion from the larynx.

laryngoscope (lā-ring'gō-skōp), n. [= F. laryngoscope, < Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + σκοπεῖν, see.] A contrivance for examining the larynx and trachea. It consists of a plane mirror introduced into the mouth, and placed at such an angle that the light thrown on it from a concave reflector, in the center of which is an aperture, is made to illuminate the larynx, the image of which is reflected back through the aperture in the reflector to the eye of the observer.

laryngoscopic (lā-ring-gō-skop'ik), a. [< laryngoscope + -ic.] Pertaining to the laryngoscope, or to inspection of the larynx.

laryngoscopical (lā-ring-gō-skop'i-kal), a. [< laryngoscopic + -al.] Same as laryngoscopic.

Laryngologists . . . have utilized this property [of cocaine] only in making laryngoscopical examinations.
Therapeutic Gazette, VIII. 559.

laryngoscopically (lā-ring-gō-skop'i-kal-i), adv. By means of the laryngoscope.

On attempting to examine the throat laryngoscopically, a most frightful spasm came on. Medical News, XLVIII. 717.

laryngoscopist (lar-ing-gos'kō-pist), n. [< laryngoscope + -ist.] One versed in the use of the laryngoscope; one who practises inspection of the larynx.

laryngoscopy (lar-ing-gos'kō-pi), n. [< Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + -σκοπία, < σκοπεῖν, view.] The art of using the laryngoscope; inspection ★of the larynx.

laryngospasm (lā-ring'gō-spazm), n. [< Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + σπασμός, spasm.] In pathol., spasm of the constrictors of the glottis.

laryngostenosis (lā-ring"gō-stē-nō'sis), n. [NL., < Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + στένωσις, a being straitened.] In pathol., contraction of the passage through the larynx.

laryngotome (lā-ring'gō-tōm), n. [< Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + τομός, cutting, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] An instrument for performing laryngotomy.

laryngotomic (lā-ring-gō-tom'ik), a. [< laryngotom-y + -ic.] Pertaining to or of the nature of laryngotomy.

laryngotomy (lar-ing-got'ō-mi), n. [< LGr. λαρυγγοτομία, < Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + τομή, a cutting, < τέμνειν, ταμεῖν, cut.] The operation of making an incision into the larynx, to relieve respiration when obstructed, to remove foreign bodies, or for other reasons.

laryngotracheal (lā-ring-gō-trā'kē-al), a. [< Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), throat (larynx), + τραχεῖα, trachea: see trachea.] Of or pertaining to both the larynx and the trachea.

In all the Amphibia, a glottis, placed on the ventral wall of the œsophagus, opens into a short laryngo-tracheal chamber. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 162.

laryngotracheotomy (lā-ring-gō-trā-kē-ot'ō-mi), n. [< Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), larynx, + τραχεῖα, trachea, + τομή, a cutting. Cf. tracheotomy.] Incision into the larynx and the trachea involving the cricoid and one or more of the upper tracheal rings.

larynx (lar'ingks), n.; pl. larynges, rarely larynxes (lā-rin'jēz, lar'ingk-sez). [NL., < Gr. λάρυγξ (λαρυγγ-), the upper part of the windpipe, also the throat, gullet.] The part of the windpipe in which vocal sound is made and modulated; the organ of phonation. In man the larynx is the enlarged and modified upper end of the trachea, with some associate parts, as the epiglottis. It opens by the glottis into the pharynx; below, its cavity is directly continuous with that of the trachea or windpipe. It causes the protuberance of the throat called Adam's apple or pomum Adami. The framework of the larynx is gristly, and composed of nine cartilages—namely, the thyroid, the largest, in two symmetrical halves, forming most of the walls; the cricoid, the enlarged upper ring of the trachea; a pair of arytenoids, small pyramidal pieces; a pair of cornicula laryngis or cartilages of Santorini; a pair of cuneiform cartilages or cartilages of Wrisberg. From the arytenoid cartilages, which sit on the posterior part of the cricoid ring, three folds of membrane pass forward on each side: above and from the tips of the arytenoids, inclosing the cornicula laryngis and cartilages of Wrisberg, the arytenoepiglottic folds pass to the lateral margins of the epiglottis; next below, the false vocal cords run from the anterior surface of the arytenoids to the angle between the two halves of the thyroid, while below this again the true vocal cords are attached behind to the vocal processes of the arytenoid and in front are inserted close to the angle of the thyroid below the insertion of the false vocal cords. The true vocal cords bound the anterior two thirds of the glottis, the posterior third lying between the arytenoid cartilages. Between the true and the false vocal cords on each side there is a recess called a ventricle or sinus of the larynx, which leads into a pouch, the sacculus laryngis. The nerves of the larynx are branches of the vagus. The larynx acts at once as a gate guarding the windpipe and as a vocal organ. It is closed by the approximation of the three mucous folds of one side to those of the other, the epiglottis contributing to the closing of the gap between the aryteno-epiglottic folds. In phonation the arytenoid cartilages are swung around so as to close the rima respiratoria and to bring the vocal cords close to one another and parallel. The vocal cords are drawn tense by intrinsic laryngeal muscles, according to the height of pitch desired. The larynx is larger in men than in women and boys by about one third. The average length of the vocal cords is $\frac{7}{10}$ of an inch in men, $\frac{5}{10}$ in women; of the slit of the glottis, $\frac{1}{2}$ in men, $\frac{3}{5}$ in women. The cracking of the voice in boys at the approach of puberty is due to the rapid growth and change of shape of the larynx: the size is almost doubled in two or three years. In various animals the larynx may be situated anywhere along the windpipe, or even in the bronchial tube. It is generally at the top of the trachea. In birds there are two larynges, one at the top, the other at the bottom of the trachea. The latter is called the syrinx. When the syrinx is still more inferior in position it is wholly bronchial; then there are a pair, right and left, making with the one at the top, three larynges. See cut under mouth.

las[1]†, n. A Middle English form of lace.

las[2]†, a. An obsolete variant of less[1]. Chaucer.

lascar (las-kär'), n. [Probably an erroneous use of Hind. lashkar, an army; or an abbreviation of Hind. Pers. lashkarī, belonging to the army, military, a soldier, < lashkar, an army; cf. Ar. 'askar, army.] 1. In the East Indies, a native tent-pitcher, camp-follower, or regimental servant. [It is properly a common name, but is usually treated as a proper name.]

Some Lascars and Sepoys were now sent forward to clear the road.
Orme, Hist. Military Transac. in Indostan, I. 394.

2. An East Indian sailor. [The more common use.]

The ship's company numbered about two hundred, all told, one-fourth of whom were Lascars and Malays, employed as stokers and coal-trimmers.
J. W. Palmer, Up and Down the Irrawaddi, p. 14.

lascaree (las-ka-rē'), n. [< Hind. lashkarī, belonging to the army, military: see lascar.] A short spear used in the East Indies as a hunting-spear, or more rarely as a javelin for throwing.

lasche[1]†, n. and v. See lash[1].

lasche[2]†, a. See lash[2].

lasciviate† (la-siv'i-āt), v. i. [Irreg. < L. lascivus, wanton: see lascivous.] To be lascivious; play the wanton. Bailey, 1731.

lasciviency† (la-siv'i-en-si), n. [< lascivien(t) + -cy.] Lasciviousness.

lascivient† (la-siv'i-ent), a. [< L. lascivien(t-)s, ppr. of lascivire, be wanton, sport, < lascivus, wanton; playful: see lascivious, lascivous.] Lascivious.

lascivious (la-siv'i-us), a. [An altered form, after lascivient or L. lascivia, wantonness, of lascivous: see lascivous.] 1. Wanton; lewd; lustful: as, lascivious men; lascivious desires.

Chi. How do you like the song?
Lucina. I like the air well;
But for the words, they are lascivious,
And over-light for ladies.
Fletcher, Valentinian, ii. 5.

He on Eve
Began to cast lascivious eyes.
Milton, P. L., ix. 1014.

2. Tending to excite voluptuous emotions; luxurious.

He capers nimbly in a lady's chamber
To the lascivious pleasing of a lute.
Shak., Rich. III., i. 1. 13.

=Syn. 1. Lecherous, libidinous, licentious, lewd, lustful, salacious, unchaste, incontinent.

lasciviously (la-siv'i-us-li), adv. In a lascivious manner; loosely; wantonly; lewdly.

lasciviousness (la-siv'i-us-nes), n. 1. Lascivious desires or conduct; lewdness; wantonness; lustfulness; looseness of behavior.

Who, being past feeling, have given themselves over unto lasciviousness. Eph. iv. 19.

2. Tendency to excite lust; lascivious or lewd character.

The reason pretended by Augustus was the lasciviousness of his Elegies and his Art of Love.
Dryden, Pref. to Ovid.

lascivous† (la-sī'vus), a. [= F. lascif = Sp. Pg. It. lascivo, < L. lascivus, wanton, playful, sportive, loose, licentious; perhaps for laxivus*, < laxus, loose, lax: see lax[1] and lask[1]. Less prob. akin to Skt. √ lash, desire, √ las, be lively.] An obsolete variant of lascivious. [Rare.]

To depaint lascious [read lascivous] wantonness.
Holland.

lase†, n. and v. An obsolete spelling of lace.

laser[1] (lā'sėr), n. [< ME. laser = F. Pg. laser = Sp. láser = It. lasero, < L. laser, juice of laserpitium.] A gum-resin obtained from the north of Africa, and greatly esteemed by the ancients as an antispasmodic, deobstruent, and diuretic. It is supposed to have been produced by Thapsia Gargarica or one of the varieties of that plant. Also called asadulcis.

Yf thai be soure, eke stamppe a quantitee

God yeve this monk a thousand last quad yeer [cargoes of bad years]. Chaucer, Prol. to Prioress's Tale, l. 4.

2. A load of some commodity with reference to its weight and commercial value; hence, a particular weight or measure, varying in amount in different localities and for different commodities. As an absolute measure, a last is generally reckoned at 4,000 pounds; but the word is now rarely met with, and only in local or technical use. A last of flax or feathers is 1,700 pounds; of wool, 12 sacks; of corn, 10 quarters or 80 bushels; of meal or ashes, 12 barrels; of gunpowder, 24 barrels; of codfish or white herrings, 12 barrels; of red herrings, 20 cades (of 500 or 720 fishes each); of pitch or tar, 14 barrels. A last of leather is given as 20 dickers of 10 hides each; but a last of hides is 12 dozen.

They will pay . . . for a last of hides to bee caryed out of our realme and dominion halfe a marke aboue that which heretofore was payed. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 137.

Even as in ships of war, whose lasts of powder
Are laid, men think, to make them last.
Chapman, Bussy D'Ambois, v. 1.

These fishing ships doe take yeerely two hundred thousand last of fish, twelue barrels to a last, which amounts to 300000 pounds by the fishermens price.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, II. 217.

last[4]† (låst), n. [ME. last, lest, < Icel. löstr (last-), fault, = Dan. Sw. last, vice; cf. OS. lastar = OHG. lastar, MHG. G. laster, blame, abuse; AS. leahtor, blame; from a verb represented by AS. leán = OHG. lahan, blame.] Fault.

Steele, Spectator, No. 2.

May children of our children say
"She wrought her people lasting good."
Tennyson, To the Queen.

=Syn. Lasting, Durable, Permanent, Stable, enduring, abiding, undecaying, perpetual, unending. Lasting means resisting the effects of time or other influences tending to produce decay; continuing for a long time, or as long as the nature of the object admits. It is the proper word for abstract things: as, a lasting impression; sudden reformations are seldom lasting. Durable is preferable for tangible objects, and means capable of resisting wear and tear: as, durable material. Permanent, remaining to the end, abiding for ever, applies equally to physical and abstract objects: as, a permanent dye; a permanent situation; the grave is a permanent resting-place. Permanent and stable imply less of resistance than the others. Stable means permanent in its place, lasting upon its foundations, able to stand indefinitely: as, a stable form of government; a stable character.

Death, only death, can break the lasting chain.
Pope, Eloisa to Abelard, l. 173.

With pins of adamant
And chains they made all fast; too fast they made
And durable! Milton, P. L., x. 320.

Was anything permanent? anything stable? Nothing but truth. J. F. Clarke, Ten Great Religions, iv. 3.

The mutability in the public councils, arising from a rapid succession of new members, however qualified they may be, points out, in the strongest manner, the necessity of some stable institution in the government.
A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. 62.

lasting-awl (lȧs'ting-âl), n. A shoemakers' awl having an eye near the point and carrying a bobbin for thread in the handle. It is used in sewing by hand to pass the thread through the leather and to assist in forming a lock-stitch with a second thread.

lateral-temporal (lat'ę-ral-tem'pō-ral), a. An epithet applied to one of three principal fossæ of the skull of Lacertilia, situated between the squamosal and the postfrontal above, the jugal and quadrate in front and behind, and the quadratojugal ligament below. Huxley.

Lateran (lat'ę-ran), a. [< L. Lateranus, a Roman family name: see def.] Pertaining to or connected with a locality in Rome called the Lateran: as, the Lateran palace or basilica; the Lateran councils. The site so named belonged in the first century to the family of the Laterani, was confiscated by Nero, and given by Constantine to the Bishop of Rome, together with the palace and the basilica built upon it. This Lateran basilica, originally called the Church of Christ the Saviour, has since the tenth century borne the name of St. John Lateran, from the adjoining monastery of St. John, and is the Pope's cathedral church, officially styled "mother and head of all churches of the City [Rome] and the world." It was consecrated in A. D. 324, and has been rebuilt several times, the present structure, which dates from the fourteenth century, having been modernized in the seventeenth. The Lateran palace was the residence of the popes for nearly a thousand years (till 1309), was afterward burned and rebuilt, and is now used as a museum, containing both classical and Christian antiquities. Adjoining the basilica is the ancient baptistery in which, according to tradition, Constantine was baptized.—Lateran councils, eleven councils held in the Lateran basilica, including an important synod convened against the Monothelites in 649, and five general councils of the Western Church (1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, and 1512–1517), regarded by Roman Catholics as ecumenical, the fourth being the most important.

lateredt, a. [ME., < AS. lætrǣde, slow of counsel, < læt, slow, late, + rǣd, counsel: see read[1], rede[1], -red.] Given to procrastination; inclined to delay or postpone.

II. n. A spider of the group Laterigradæ, as a thomisid.

laterinerved (lat'ę-ri-nėrvd), a. [< L. latus (later-), side, + nervus, nerve, + E. -ed[2].] In bot., having lateral nerves: applied to leaves.

laterite (lat'ę-rīt), n. [< L. later, a brick, a tile, + -ite[2].] A rock of peculiar character, found in India and some parts of southwestern Asia. Its essential features are that it is highly ferruginous and that it forms the superficial covering of the country. In its normal form it is a porous argillaceous rock, largely impregnated with the peroxid of iron, some kinds containing as much as 25 or 30 per cent. of metallic iron. Although the laterite is in process of formation at the present time, some of it dates back to the Tertiary, and perhaps as far back as the Eocene. There are two rather distinct forms of this rock. One is extensively developed on the west coast of India, where it forms the surface-rock of the country over wide tracts of the low lands near the sea. This, which is called the low-level laterite, is clearly of detrital origin, and it rests indifferently on various older rocks. The iron it contains appears to be due to the fact that it is formed, in part at least, from the debris of the high-level laterite, and in part to the large quantity of iron ore present in the old volcanic rocks of the region. The origin of the high-level laterite, which is found extensively on the highlands of central and western India, is more difficult to explain. It appears, beyond doubt, to have resulted in considerable part from the decomposition in situ, by atmospheric agencies, of the volcanic rock which it overlies.

lateritic (lat-ę-rit'ik), a. [< laterite + -ic.] Pertaining to or characterized by laterite.

> The lateritic deposits of Madras. Nature.

lateritious (lat-ę-rish'us), a. See latericeous.

lateritypic (lat″ę-ri-tip'ik), a. [< laterityp-y + -ic.] Characterized by lateritypy; bilaterally symmetrical.

lateritypy (lat'ę-ri-tī-pi), n. [< L. latus (later-) side, + Gr. τύπος, type.] Same as bilateral symmetry (which see, under bilateral).

latermoret, a. [< later + -more.] Secondary; of less importance. Also lattermore.

> Is it mete that the carnal be first, & that thing to be latermore which is spiritual & gostly?
> J. Udall, On Mark i.

laterocaudal (lat″ę-rō-kâ'dal), a. [< L. latus (later-), side, + cauda, tail: see caudal.] In zoöl., lateral and hinder; situated on the side posteriorly; posterolateral.

> Latero-caudal angles of the head unarmed.
> Comstock, Introd. to Entom. (1888), p. 219.

laterodorsal (lat″ę-rō-dôr'sal), a. [< L. latus (later-), side, + dorsum, back: see dorsal.] In zoöl. and bot., situated on the side of the upper surface: as, a laterodorsal spot or line on an insect, or the upper rows of leaves in the foliose Jungermanniaceæ.

lateroflection, lateroflexion (lat″ę-rō-flek'shon), n. Same as lateriflection.

laterofrontal (lat″ę-rō-fron'tal), a. [< L. latus (later-), side, + frons (front-), front: see frontal.] Situated on the side in front. Encyc. Brit.

lateromarginal (lat″ę-rō-mär'ji-nal), a. [< L. latus (later-), side, + margo (margin-), edge: see marginal.] Situated on the lateral margin or side edge.

> A few postero-marginal or caudal, but never a continuous series of latero-marginal setæ.
> W. S. Kent, Man. Infusoria, II. 792.

lateronuchal (lat″ę-rō-nū'chal), a. [< L. latus (later-), side, + ML. nucha, nape: see nuchal.] Situated on the side of the nape.

> Latero-nuchal feathers elongated, rigid, with long disconnected fibrillæ. Coues, Key to N. A. Birds, p. 734.

laterostigmatal (lat″ę-rō-stig'ma-tal), a. [< L. latus (later-), side, + NL. stigmata.] In entom., situated on the side, just above the stigmata or breathing-pores: as, laterostigmatal spines: used principally in describing larvæ. Also laterostigmatic.

lateroversion (lat″ę-rō-vėr'shon), n. [< L. latus (later-), side, + (ML.) versio(n-), a turning: see version.] A turning to one side.

Lates (lā'tēz), n. [NL., < Gr. λάτος, a fish of the Nile.] 1. A genus of serranoid fishes. Lates nilotica is known as the Nile perch.—2. [l. c.] A fish of this genus; the Nile perch. It sometimes grows to the length of 3 feet.

latescence (lā-tes'ens), n. [< latescen(t) + -ce.] The quality or condition of being latescent; the state of becoming obscured or lost to view.

This obscuration can be conceived in every infinite degree between incipient latescence and irrecoverable latency.
Sir W. Hamilton.

latescent (lā-tes′ent), a. [< L. latescen(t-)s, ppr. of latescere, lie hidden, < latere, lurk, lie hidden: see latent.] Becoming latent or obscure; not obvious to perception or cognizance.

It is too familiar to be notorious, lying, in fact, unexpressed and latescent in every concrete application.
Sir W. Hamilton.

latesome[1] (lāt′sum), a. [< ME. latsome, < AS. lætsum, slow, late, < læt, late: see late[1] and -some.] Somewhat late; backward. [Rare.]

latesome[2] (lāt′sum), a. [< ME. latesom, laytsom, latsome, < AS. wlātsum, hateful, < wlātian, be disgusted. In the first sense now merged in loathsome; in the second confused with latesome[1].] 1†. Loathsome; hateful.

But to here of Cristis passioun,
To many a man it is ful laytsom.
MS. Ashmole, 60, f. 5. (Halliwell.)

2. Tiresome; tedious. [Prov. Eng.]

He es swyft to speke on hys manere,
And latsome and slawe for to here;
He prayses awide men and haldes thaim wyse.
Hampole, MS. Bowes, p. 35. (Halliwell.) latest (lā′test), a. [Superl. of late: see late[1] and last[5].] Last; final.

Even he who long the House of Com-ns led,
That hydra dire, with many a gaping head,
Found by experience, to his latest breath,
Envy could only be subdu'd by death.
Jenyns, Imit. of Horace's Epistle, i. 1.

latewake† (lāt′wāk), n. A corruption of likewake.

lateward† (lāt′wärd), a. [< late[1] + -ward.] Somewhat late; belated; backward.

Lateward fruit. Huloet.

They deserue much more to be reprehended than I will vouchsafe to attempt in this my lateward treatise.
Holinshed, Descrip. of Scotland, xiii.

If it should fall out so lateward a breaking vp of the riuer.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 455.

latex (lā′teks), n. [L., a liquid, fluid, juice.] A milk-like liquid occurring in many plants in special vessels (called laticiferous, or sometimes cinenchymatous), and exuding when the plant is wounded. It may be white, like that of the milkweeds and many species of Euphorbia; or yellow, as in the prickly poppy, Argemone; or orange, as in celandine, Chelidonium. It consists of a watery fluid holding in solution small quantities of sugar, gum, alkaloid and acid matters, etc., and, suspended in this, numerous minute granules (giving the milky appearance) which coagulate when exposed to the air. It has sometimes an economic importance, as in the case of opium (the dried latex of the poppy) and of india-rubber.—Latex-cells, latex-tubes, ★the vessels which contain latex. See laticiferous.

lath[1] (lăth), n. [< ME. lathe, latthe, laththe, prob. < AS. læthth*, found only in the altered form lætt, pl. lætta, ME. latte, E. dial. lat = MD. latte, D. lat, a lath, = OHG. latta, lata, MHG. latte, late, lat, G. latte, lath, thin plate, = Sp. Pg. lata = F. latte, a lath, = It. latta = Pg. lata, tin-plate (see latten); akin to MHG. lade, laden, G. laden, a board, plank, sash, shutter (but prob. not to lathe[1] or lathe[2]). Hence ult. latten and lattice.] 1. A thin narrow strip of wood, used in building to form the groundwork for a roof or for the plastering of walls and ceilings. For the former purpose the laths are nailed to the rafters to support the tiling, slating, or other roof-covering. Laths for walls and ceilings, much narrower and thinner, are nailed to the studs, with small spaces between them, into which a part of the plaster sinks when applied, forming a key or hold for the remainder. Iron laths have been used in fire-proof buildings. See lathing[1].

Come and get thee a sword, though made of a lath.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iv. 2. 2.

2†. The bow-part of a crossbow.

Their bows are for form and length not unlike the lath of a large crosse-bow, made of the horns of Buffoloes.
Sandys, Travailes, p. 50.

Dagger of lath. See dagger[1].—Lath and plaster, a wall-surface formed of laths plastered over; a slight partition formed of laths and plaster.

I traced the blood [of the rats] . . . through the openings in the lath and plaster.
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, III. 21.

Lath floated and set fair, three-coat plaster-work in which the first coat is termed pricking up, the second floating, the third finishing. The last is done with fine stuff.—Lath laid and set, two-coat plaster-work, in which the first coat is called laying, and is often scratched with a broom.—Lath-sawing machine, a machine for sawing laths from the board, or directly from the bolt. The cylindrical log is mounted upon journals on gravitating guide-bars and is rotated by rollers. The laths are sawed from its periphery by saws cutting rectangularly to each other. E. H. Knight.—Lath-shaped crystals. See ophitic structure, under ophitic.—Metallic lath. See lathing[1].

lath[1] (lăth), v. t. [< lath[1], n.] To cover or line with or as with laths.

A small kiln consists of an oaken frame, lathed on every side. Mortimer, Husbandry.

lath[2] (lăth), n. See lathe[3].

lath-brick (lăth′brik), n. A kind of brick, 22 inches long and 6 inches broad, used in kilns to dry malt on. Lath-bricks are so named from being used as a substitute for laths.

lath-coop (lăth′köp), n. Same as lath-pot.

lath-cutter (lăth′kut′ėr), n. A power-machine ★for cutting laths from a plank or bolt.

lathe[1] (lāŦH), n. [< Icel. lōdh (ladh-), pl. ladhar, = Dan. lad, a smiths' lathe. Connection with lathe[2] is improbable, unless Icel. lōdh stands for orig. hlōdh;* see lathe[2].] 1. A machine for working wood, metals, or other substances by causing the material to turn with greater or less speed, according to the nature of the material and the work to be performed, before a tool which is held at rest relatively to the peripheral motion of the object operated upon. Lathes are used for turning, cutting, chasing, filing, polishing, screw-cutting, engraving, and shaping, as in metal-spinning. They range in size from a jewelers' lathe for polishing the finest metal-work, through the various wood-turning lathes, to the large machine-lathes for turning locomotive-wheels, and the heavy machines for polishing stone and marble columns for architectural purposes. The ancient potters' wheel is probably the prototype of the modern lathe. The common wood-turning lathe may be taken as a type of these machines. It consists essentially of the bed or main horizontal frame, the poppets, and the rest or support of the tool used in operating the lathe. The poppets can be moved into different positions and clamped on the bed, and form at the left the live or moving head-stock, connected directly with the source of power, and at the right the dead or stationary head-stock, sometimes called tail-stock. The work or material is placed between these, and is supported by a live center in the live head-stock and a dead center in the dead head-stock; and in the ordinary lathe the cutting is performed concentrically with the axis joining these centers, the material being rotated by the live head-stock. By the adjustment of the poppets on the bed the lathe may be adapted to receive different lengths of material. Usually the dead head-stock only is moved toward or away from the live head-stock in making this adjustment. Facing the work, and clamped to the bed between the poppets, is the tool-rest, on which, in hand-turning, the tool rests as on a fulcrum at a point very near the work, being held in the working position by the hands of the turner, which grasp the outwardly projecting handle of the tool. Such a lathe is driven at high speed, and the amount and character of the turning are controlled by the workman who holds the tool on the tool-rest and before the work. The side-rest is a movable tool-rest carrying an adjustable tool-stock or tool-post in which the tool is rigidly clamped. It slides on longitudinal guideways formed on the bed of the lathe, this movement being controlled by a screw and sometimes being automatic. The tool-rest may be double, presenting two tools, one on each side of the work, as in the duplex lathe. The tool may also be controlled by a templet or model, and shift its position automatically, as in the lathe for turning irregular forms, the nulled-work lathe, spoke-lathe, and last-lathe, of which the Blanchard lathe is the original type. Iron-turning requires a much slower speed than brass-turning, and wood-turning a higher speed than brass. Large metal-lathes are said to be of large swing; that is, the space between the centers and the bed is great, to admit of turning large objects. In one form of these machine-lathes an opening is made in the bed to permit the work to turn or to give large swing, as in the gap-bed lathe. In many kinds of turning the dead head-stock is not used, the material to be turned being attached to a lathe-chuck, or to a face-plate carried by the live head-stock. Lathes are nearly all described by their names, as beadwork-lathe, button-lathe, foot-lathe, shafting-lathe, etc., the name sometimes referring to some feature of the construction, as the hollow mandrel lathe, and sometimes to the material or work, as the hat-ironing lathe.

Could turn his word, and oath, and faith,
As many ways as in a lathe.
S. Butler, Hudibras, III. ii. 376.

2. That part of a loom in which the reed is fixed, and by the movements of which the weft-threads are laid parallel to each other, shot after shot, in the process of weaving. According to the greater or less impulse of the lathe, the weft is laid more or less closely together in the plane of the web. Also called batten and lay.—Beadwork-lathe, a lathe specially adapted or devoted to turning beadwork.—Blanchard lathe, a lathe in which the tool-position is shifted by a pattern or model to turn irregular forms. Gun-stocks, ox-yokes, wagon-wheel spokes, shoe-lasts, certain styles of carvings, columns, etc., are made in lathes working on this principle, the lathes taking their special names from the kind of work they perform, as spoke-lathe, last-lathe, gun-stock lathe, etc. This lathe is named from its original inventor, Thomas Blanchard of Massachusetts (1788–1864), who patented it in 1819, and subsequently, with others, adapted it to a great variety of uses.—Button-lathe, a kind of chuck-lathe used in manufacturing buttons.—Car-wheel lathe, a double lathe for turning off the rims of locomotive driving-wheels or car-wheels. It is so arranged that two wheels fitted on one axle may be turned together, or, when desirable, two wheels may be turned independently, as each face-plate can be driven separately.—Compound lathe, a lathe for turning or engraving geometric forms; a geometric lathe or rose-engine.—Copying lathe, a form of lathe adapted for turning articles from a pattern on the principle of the Blanchard lathe.—Cutting-off lathe, a lathe for cutting rods, bars, and pipes to length. The object to be cut is passed through a collet at the rear end of the spindle, a concentric chuck holding it in front.—Duplex lathe, a lathe with two or more cutting-tools, so distributed about the work as to balance the transverse pressure and avoid springing it.—Eccentric lathe, a lathe having a compound face-plate or sliding frame, and guides which present the object in such a way that the tool works an oval upon it.—Gap-bed lathe, a lathe having an opening in its bed to admit of turning objects of larger radius than would be possible with a continuous bed. Also called gap-lathe, break-lathe.—Geometrical lathe, an instrument used by bank-note engravers, watch-case manufacturers, etc., to make complicated patterns of fine lines. It forms the stars, rosettes, ornamental borders, etc., on plates for bank-notes, designed as a precaution against counterfeiting. Also called rose-engine.—Gun-stock lathe. See Blanchard lathe.—Hat-ironing lathe, a lathe used for ironing hats. The hat-block is chucked in the lathe, and the heated iron is held against the nap while the block is turned.—Hollow-mandrel lathe, a lathe in which the mandrel of the live head-stock is hollow. It is much used for cutting screws upon, or for turning off the ends of long and slender rods, which are thrust through the hollow mandrel with the end of the rod which is to be turned projecting from the nose of the mandrel, and held in position for turning by a universal chuck or other suitable holder. See chuck[4] and mandrel.—Parallel lathe, a small hand-machine for jewelers', watchmakers',

a, hollow live-stock carrying the rod, wire, or other material to be cut and causing it to revolve in contact with each tool in the turret in turn; b, six-sided turret carrying six separate tools or groups of tools, each, by the revolution of the turret, being in turn presented to the work; c, active tool-holder in cutting position.

or dentists' use. It is arranged to run simultaneously, if desired, several grinding-wheels of different sizes, a brush, a drill, etc.—Roughing-lathe, a lathe used by electrotypers as a substitute for a planer in "surfacing up" the backings of electrotypes preparatory to mounting them on wooden blocks. The plates are chucked upon a true face-plate attached to the mandrel of the lathe, with their printing-faces against the face-plate, and the backing-metal is turned off by a sharp cutting-tool controlled by a gage. The back surface is thus made parallel with the printing-surface, and the plate is reduced to the required thickness.—Sphere-turning lathe, a lathe adapted for turning objects to a true spherical shape.—Wood-turning lathe, a high-speed lathe the construction of which is specially adapted to wood-turning. It is the simplest form of lathe. The tools consist of a great variety of chisels and gouges of different widths, with long wooden handles, by which leverage is obtained upon the tool-rest as a fulcrum, for holding the tools firmly yet delicately with their cutting edges in proper relation with the material in the lathe. The same kind of lathe is also used for turning ivory, horn, bone, etc., the speed being regulated and the forms of the tools being varied to suit the nature of the materials. (See also bench-lathe, carving-lathe, center-lathe, chuck-lathe, column-lathe, gage-lathe.) lathe[2] (lāŦH), n. [Also laith; < ME. lathe, < Icel. hladha = Dan. lade = Sw. lada, a barn, shed (in comp. Dan. bog-lade = Sw. bok-låda, bookstore), = G. laden, a booth, shop, stall, orig. 'store,' prob. from the verb represented by Icel. hladha = AS. hladan, E. lade, etc., load: see lade[1]. In this case the word is not connected with E. lathe[1], and G. laden, a plank, board, sash, shutter, etc., lade, a box, chest, etc.: see lathe[1].] A barn or granary. [Prov. Eng.]

lathe[5]†, a. A Middle English form of loath.

lathe[6]†, v. A Middle English form of loathe.

lathe-bearer (lāᵺ'bâr″ėr), n. Same as lathe-carrier.

> The grinder is laid upon the lathe-bearers or other support. O. Byrne, Artisan's Handbook, p. 140.

lathe-carrier (lāᵺ'kar″i-ėr), n. An appliance fastened to an object under operation in a lathe. It causes the object to rotate with the mandrel and faceplate of the live head by means of a projection which collides with the stud or pin on the latter. Also called lathe-dog, lathe-bearer.

lathe-center (lāᵺ'sen″tėr), n. A piece of hardened steel, round and tapered, having the smaller end cut off squarely and the larger end of the form of a cone. One of these centers is fitted to a socket in the nose of the mandrel of the live head-stock, and the other into a socket in the spindle of the dead head-stock. The former is called the live-center; the latter, the dead-center. The piece to be turned (for example, a piece of shafting) is prepared for placing in the lathe by centrally countersinking the ends. The conical ends of the lathe-centers are made to engage the countersunk ends of the piece in the countersinks, and the spindle of the dead head-stock is then clamped in position. The piece to be turned is then clamped to the mandrel by means of a chuck or a lathe-carrier. The spindle of the dead head-stock is usually provided with an adjusting-screw and a clamping-screw by which the dead-center is adjusted to and firmly held in position.

lathe-chuck (lāᵺ'chuk), n. A device screwed to the mandrel of a lathe and grasping the object to be turned, bored, ground, polished, or the like. E. H. Knight.

Lathe-chuck.
B, B, the dogs, are advanced or caused to recede by the action of a wheel, C.

lathe-cords (lāᵺ'kôrdz), n. pl. Cords used to turn lathes. They are made of the intestines of horses, cleaned and prepared by the separation of the mucous membrane.

lathe-dog (lāᵺ'dog), n. Same as lathe-carrier.

lathe-drill (lāᵺ'dril), n. A horizontal lathe used for drilling.

lathee, lathi (lät'ē), n. [Hind. lāṭhī, a stick, club; cf. lāṭh, a staff, pillar.] In India, a stick; a bludgeon, usually of bamboo and often loaded with iron. Also lattee.

> The natives use a very dangerous weapon, which they have been forbidden by Government to carry. . . . It is a very heavy lathi, a solid male bamboo, 5 feet 5 inches long, headed with iron in a most formidable manner.
> Fanny Parkes, Wanderings in Search of the Picturesque, I. 133.

lathe-head (lāᵺ'hed), n. 1. The poppet, poppet-head, or head-stock of a lathe.—2. A small dental or laboratory lathe that may be fitted to a bench. It carries a single spindle on two curved arms, and is used by fitting laps, grinding-wheels, small brushes, and other light circular tools to the ends of the spindle. It is operated by a treadle and a light belt.

Lathe-head (def. 2).

lathe-hoist (lāᵺ'hoist), n. A device for raising work in the lathe to the height of the lathe-centers.

lathen (lath'ėn), a. [< lath[1] + -en[2].] Made of lath. [Rare.]

> Lathen daggers. Ainsworth, Lancashire Witches, iii. 9.

lather[1] (laᵺ'ėr), n. [< ME. lather, < AS. leáthor, a kind of niter used for soap, lather, = Icel. laudhr, mod. löðr, froth, foam, a kind of niter or soap used in washing, = Sw. lodder, soap.] 1. Foam, froth, or suds made from soap moistened with water, as by a brush for shaving.

> Soap containing small proportions of glycerin . . . forms a very tenacious lather. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 204.

2. Foam or froth formed in profuse sweating, as of a horse.

> He made the round of the hill and came back, his horse covered with lather and its tail trembling.
> C. Reade, Love me Little, xiv.

lather[1] (laᵺ'ėr), v. [< ME. lethren*, < AS. lēthrian, lȳthrian, lather, smear (= Icel. laudhra, foam, be dripping wet with salt water, leydhra, wash), < leáthor, lather: see lather[1], n.] I. intrans. To form a foam or suds, as soap and water; become froth or frothy matter.

> Blackstone, Com., Int., § 4.

lathe-saw (lāᵺ'sâ), n. A small circular saw or fret-saw which can be fitted upon an ordinary lathe and operated by its mechanism.

lath-hammer (lâth'ham″ėr), n. Same as lathing-hammer.

lathi, n. See lathee.

lathing[1] (lâth'ing), n. [Verbal n. of lath[1], v.] A foundation of lath or other material on a wall or ceiling, under the plaster; also, the material used for such a foundation. Metallic lathing is now used in the form of perforated and corrugated sheet-metal, rods, bars, and wire netting. The last form, under the name of woven-wire lathing, is the most usual kind. Such lathing is used in constructing fire-proof walls and ceilings, and in general to take the place of the common and dangerous wooden lathing for the support of plastering.

lathing[2] (lā'thing), n. [< ME. lathyng = AS. lathung = OFries. lathenge, ladinge = OHG. ladunga, MHG. ladunge, G. ladung, a calling, invitation; verbal n. of lathe[4], v.] An invitation. Bailey, 1731; Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

lathing-clamp (lâth'ing-klamp), n. A clamp to hold a set of spaced laths while they are being nailed to the studding. E. H. Knight.

lathing-hammer (lâth'ing-ham″ėr), n. In carp., a hammer which has a small hatchet-face on the side opposite the hammer-head and in line with it, the hatchet being used for cutting laths, and the hammer for nailing them to the studs. The hatchet has usually a small lateral nick for drawing out nails. Also called lath-hammer.

lath-mill (lâth'mil), n. A gang-saw for cutting laths from the log.

lath-nail (lâth'nāl), n. A small cut nail used for fastening laths to studding. E. H. Knight.

lath-pot (lâth'pot), n. In U. S. fisheries, a coop or trap made of laths or thin strips of wood.

> The term lath-pot is almost universally employed to designate the common forms of closed lobster traps, whether semi-cylindrical or rectangular in shape, providing they are constructed of laths or of any narrow strips of wood. Other names by which they are known to the fishermen are "box-traps," "house-pots," "stick-pots," and "lath-coops." Fisheries of U. S., V. ii. 666.

Lathræa (lath-rē'ä), n. [NL. (Linnæus), so called as growing in concealed places, < Gr. λαθραῖος, secret, hidden; cf. λάθρα, λάθρη, secretly, < λανθάνειν, λαθεῖν, hide: see latent.] A genus of plants of the family Orobanchaceæ, or broom-rape family, with a bell-shaped, broadly 4-cleft calyx, and short dense spike or somewhat longer loose racemes of white, yellowish, or bluish flowers, sometimes tinged with pink. Five species are known, one of which is chiefly confined to western Europe, while another is widely distributed throughout Europe and Asia, and two occur in Japan. L. Squamaria, or toothwort, is a parasitical plant, growing on the roots of trees and shrubs. It has a simple fleshy erect stem, a foot or less in height, with fleshy scale-like bracts in place of leaves, and drooping flesh-colored flowers. It occurs throughout Europe and in Asia.

lathridiid (lath-rid'i-id), n. A beetle of the family Lathridiidæ.

Lathridiidæ (lath-ri-dī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lathridius + -idæ.] A family of clavicorn coleopters having the dorsal segments of the abdomen partly membranous, ventral segments free and nearly equal, tarsi three-jointed with second joint not dilated, wings not fringed with hairs, and elytra entire. See Lathridius.

Lathridius (lath-rid'i-us), n. [NL., < Gr. λαθρίδιος, poet. for λάθριος, later form of λαθραῖος, secret, hidden: see Lathræa.] The typical genus of Lathridiidæ, having the antennal club three-jointed. They are small beetles, living under bark and stones. More than 100 species are known, mainly European and Asiatic, but 15 are North American, as L. tenuicornis. Usually Latridius, as Herbst, 1793.

Lathrobiidæ (lath-rō-bī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lathrobium + -idæ.] A family of brachelytrous coleopters, taking name from the genus Lathrobium, or merged in Staphylinidæ. Also written Lathrobiadæ, Lathrobidæ.

lathrobiiform (lath-rō'bi-i-fôrm), a. [< NL. Lathrobium + L. forma, form.] Having the form of the Lathrobiidæ; pertaining to the Lathrobiiformes.

Lathrobiiformes (lath-rō″bi-i-fôr'mēz), n. pl. [NL.: see lathrobiiform.] A group of beetles. See Lathrobiidæ.

Lathrobium (lath-rō'bi-um), n. [NL., for Lathræobium*, < Gr. λαθραῖος, hidden (see Lathræa), + βίος, life.] The typical genus of Lathrobiidæ. Also Lathrobius.

lathwork (lâth'wėrk), n. Lathing; any work in laths, or resembling lathing.

lathy (lâth'i), a. [< lath[1] + -y[1].] Long and slender, like a lath.

> The which he tossed to and fro amain,
> And eft his lathy falchion brandished.
> West, Abuse of Travelling.

> A lathy young man, bent sideways over a spar, was struggling, with a very red face, to right himself.
> B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 204.

lathyrism (lath'i-rizm), n. [< Lathyrus + -ism.] A condition produced by the use of the seeds of Lathyrus sativus and other species as food. It is characterized by formication, tremors, and paraplegia.

Lathyrus (lath'i-rus), n. [NL. (Linnæus), < Gr. λάθυρος, a kind of pulse.] A genus of leguminous plants of the tribe Vicieæ, or vetches, agreeing in the structure of the flowers with Pisum, the true pea, except that its style is not grooved on the back. See Pisum. There are probably about 100 species of these plants, inhabiting the northern hemisphere and South America. They are vines creeping or climbing by tendrils, often with large and handsome flowers. Several species are known in cultivation, and the wild species are generally known as peas, with qualifying names, that of everlasting pea being applicable to the genus in general. L. tuberosus, common in many parts of central Europe and Russian Asia, is the earthnut-pea; L. maritimus, of wide distribution on the sea-coast, is the beach-pea; L. odoratus, a native of Sicily, is the common sweet pea of the gardens; L. latifolius, the everlasting pea of the gardens, is a cultivated variety of the European species L. sylvestris. About 34 species occur in the United States, several of which, as L. ornatus and L. venosus (see cut), have broad leaflets and handsome, showy flowers.

Flowering Branch of Everlasting Pea (Lathyrus venosus).
a, flower; b, fruit.

latialite (lā′shal-īt), n. [< L. Latialis, Latin (< Latium, a country of Italy: see Latin), + *-ite*²; or for latiolite* (?), < L. Latium + Gr. λίθος, a stone (see -lite). The mineral is so called because found in the volcanic rocks of that part of Italy corresponding to the ancient Latium.] Same as haüyne.

Latian (lā′shian), a. [< Latium (see def.) + -an.] Belonging or relating to Latium, one of the districts or countries of ancient Italy; Latin. [Rare.]

By the right wheel rode Mamilius, Prince of the Latian name.
Macaulay, Horatius.

latibulize (lā-tib′ū-līz), v. i.; pret. and pp. latibulized, ppr. latibulizing. [< latibulum + -ize.] To hibernate; retreat and lie hidden. [Rare.]

The tortoise latibulizes in October. Shaw.

latibulum (lā-tib′ū-lum), n.; pl. latibula (-lä). [L., a lurking-place, < latere, lurk: see latent.] A hiding-place; a cave; a burrow. [Rare.]

laticiferous (lat-i-sif′e-rus), a. [< L. latex (latic-), a liquid, + ferre = E. *bear*¹.] In bot., bearing or containing latex.

The liber or "inner bark," on the other hand, usually contains woody fibre in addition to the cellular tissue and laticiferous canals of the preceding.
W. B. Carpenter, Micros., § 372.

Laticiferous cells, tubes, or vessels, a kind of vegetable tissue, consisting of soft-walled cells, containing latex. They are usually distributed throughout the plant to which they belong. The tubes are either articulate (De Bary), composed of long cells, freely branching, and anastomosing with others into a complex reticulated system, or non-articulate, consisting of single cells, elongating with the growth of the plant, much branched, but little if at all confluent with others.—Laticiferous tissue, laticiferous vessels taken collectively.

In many orders of Phanerogams tissues are found whose component elements contain a milky or colored fluid—the latex. To these, although varying greatly in structure and position, the general name of Laticiferous tissues has been given. Bessey, Botany, p. 76.

Laticiferous hyphæ, latex-yielding filaments occurring in the sporophores of Lactarius and other fungi of the order Agaricini.

laticlave (lat′i-klāv), n. [< LL. laticlavus, a broad stripe, < L. latus, broad, + clavus, a stripe.] 1. One of two broad stripes of purple woven in the stuff of the tunic worn by Roman senators and persons of senatorial rank, extending vertically from the neck down the front, and serving as a badge of their dignity. See angusticlave. Hence—2. The tunic ornamented with these bands or stripes, or the dignity of which it was a mark.

laticostate (lat-i-kos′tāt), a. [< L. latus, broad, + costatus, ribbed: see costa.] Broad-ribbed.

latidentate (lat-i-den′tāt), a. [< L. latus, broad, + dentatus, toothed: see dentate.] Broad-toothed.

latifoliate (lat-i-fō′li-āt), a. [< L. latus, broad, + foliatus, leafy, < folium, a leaf.] Broad-leafed, as a plant.

latifolious (lat-i-fō′li-us), a. [< L. latifolius, broad-leafed, < latus, broad, + folium, a leaf.] Same as latifoliate.

latifundium (lat-i-fun′di-um), n.; pl. latifundia (-ä). [L., a large landed estate, < latus, broad, + fundus, estate: see fund.] In Rom. hist., a great estate. In their origin through conquest or military reward, and in the organization of serf or peasant labor upon them, the latifundia resembled the early English baronial manors. In the plural, the term is used to designate the resulting system of aggrandizement, tending to concentration of the land in the hands of a few and to excessive poverty of the masses.

For the small properties of the earlier period were substituted the vast estates—the latifundia—which, in the judgment of Pliny, were the ruin of Italy.
Encyc. Brit., XIX. 350.

latigo (lä′tē-gō), n.; pl. latigos. [< Sp. látigo, a thong (origin uncertain).] A strong tapering leather strap used for tightening the cinch or girth in packing. [Western United States and Spanish-American.]

latilid (lat′i-lid), n. A fish of the family Latilidæ.

Latilidæ (lā-til′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Latilus + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Latilus, with an elongated compressed body, compressed head, a very long dorsal fin whose foremost rays only are spinose, an elongated anal fin, normal pectorals with branched rays, and thoracic or subjugular perfect ventral fins. The species are about 10 in number, referred to about 5 genera. They inhabit tropical and temperate seas, some of them reaching a large size, but have little economic importance.

Latilinæ (lat-i-lī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Latilus + -inæ.] A subfamily of fishes of the family Latilidæ, including the genera Latilus, Caulolatilus, and Lopholatilus. They have the dorsal fin continuous, the body scaly, and the upper jaw usually provided with posterior canines. These fishes form in Günther's classification a group called Pinguepedina, referred to the Trachinidæ. Species of Caulolatilus are called blanquillos or whitefish, and yellowtail. (See cut under blanquillo.) Lopholatilus chamæleonticeps is known as the tile-fish.

latiloid (lat′i-loid), a. and n. [< NL. Latilus + Gr. εἶδος, form.] I. a. Pertaining to the Latilidæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A fish of the family Latilidæ; a latilid.

Latilus (lat′i-lus), n. [NL., < L. latus, broad.] A genus of fishes, typical of the family Latilidæ and subfamily Latilinæ. Cuvier and Valenciennes.

Latilus japonicus.

latimer† (lat′i-mėr), n. [< ME. latimer, latymer, < AF. latymer, a corruption of latiner: see Latiner.] A corrupt form of latiner.

Latimer is the corruption of Latiner; it signifies he that interprets Latin; and though he interpreted French, Spanish, or Italian, he was called the King's Latiner—that is, the King's interpreter. Selden, Table-Talk, p. 179.

Latimer-Clark battery. See battery.

Latin (lat′in), a. and n. [Early mod. E. also ★Latine, Laten; < ME. Latin, Latyn (cf. A popular etym. connected the name with latere, lie hid (see latent), and made Saturn 'lie hid' here from his son.] I. a. 1. Of, pertaining to, or derived from ancient Latium or its inhabitants: as, the Latin cities; the Latin wars; the Latin language.—2. Pertaining to or having affinity with the ancient Latins in the wider sense of the word: so applied from the spread of the language and civilization of the people of Latium throughout Italy and the Roman empire: as, the Latin races of southern Europe; the Latin arts.

But Turkish force and Latin fraud
Would break your shield, however broad.
Byron, Don Juan, iii. (song).

3. Relating or pertaining to, or composed in, the language of the ancient Latins or Romans: as, a Latin idiom; a Latin poem. See II., 3.

Remuneration! O, that's the Latin word for three farthings. Shak., L. L. L., iii. 1. 138.

It is an unjust way of compute to magnify a weak head for some Latin abilities, and to undervalue a solid judgment because he knows not the genealogy of Hector.
Sir T. Browne, Christ. Morals.

John Colet, Dean of St. Paul's, founded [St. Paul's school] in the year 1510 . . . for free education of children of all nations and countries. . . . They were to be instructed . . . "in good and clene Laten literature," . . . to the exclusion of all which he terms "barbary and corruption, and Laten adulterate," and such as he says "may rather be called blotterature than literature." Blackwood's Mag., II. 465.

Dog Latin. See dog-Latin.—Latin Christianity, that form of Christian doctrine and church life which grew up among and was dominated by the Latin race: used in ecclesiastical history generally in contradistinction from Greek and sometimes from Teutonic Christianity.—Latin Church. (a) The Western Church, which from very early times down to the Reformation everywhere used Latin as its official language, whether among Latin, Celtic, or Teutonic races, as distinguished from the Greek or Oriental Church. (b) The Roman Catholic Church.—Latin cross. See *cross*¹.—Latin empire, the name given to the empire of Constantinople while under the rule of Latin (chiefly French) emperors, from 1204 to 1261.—Latin kingdom, the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem under the French or Latin kings, from 1099 to 1187, when the Christians were expelled, though the title "king of Jerusalem" was maintained long afterward.—Latin league, a confederation of the cities of Latium existing in Italy in the earliest historic times, and continuing till 338 B. C., when the Latin towns were finally incorporated in the dominion of Rome. According to the earliest tradition, the league included thirty cities, among which Alba Longa held the preëminent place. After the fall of Alba, Aricia, Lanuvium, and Tusculum, with other important communities not originally included, were united with the league. The confederation held assemblies in the grove of Ferentina, below Marino in the Alban hills, and had a common religious sanctuary in the temple of Jupiter Latiaris on the summit of the Alban Mount (Monte Cavo), where annual sacrifices were celebrated.—Latin Union, a monetary alliance of France, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland, formed by convention December 23d, 1865, and joined by Greece in 1868. Its object was the maintenance and regulation of a uniform interchangeable gold and silver coinage, based on the French franc. Its limited term was continued by two renewals (1878 and 1885), Belgium withdrawing on the latter occasion and adopting the single gold standard.

=Syn. See Roman.

II. n. 1. A member of the race that inhabited ancient Latium in central Italy, including Rome; afterward, one to whom the Latin language was vernacular; an ancient Roman, Italian, etc.—2. In modern application, a member of one of the peoples ethnically and linguistically related to the ancient Romans or Italians, by descent or intermixture: as, the Latins of Italy, France, Spain, and Portugal.—3. The language of ancient Rome; the language originally spoken in Latium, and afterward extended over all the integral parts of the Roman empire in Europe, which is the basis of the modern Romance languages (see Romance), and has supplied the greater part in bulk of the vocabulary of modern English (see English). Latin belongs to the Italican branch of the Indo-European or Aryan family, together with Oscan, Umbrian, and other dialects of which hardly any remains are extant. Its nearer relations with the other branches of the family are matters of doubt and dispute. It was formerly, on insufficient grounds, believed especially akin with Greek; more recently, it has been thought closer to Celtic. Latin, with its literature, is divided chronologically into several periods—in this dictionary, in the etymologies, into five, namely Old Latin, Classical Latin, Late Latin, Middle Latin, and New Latin. See below.

Seynt Jerome, that was a Preest and a Cardynalle, that translatede the Bible and the Psaultere from Ebrew in to Latyn. Mandeville, Travels, p. 71.

The King of France . . . shall name your highness . . . thus in Latin, Præclarissimus filius noster Henricus.
Shak., Hen. V., v. 2. 369.

I love the language, that soft bastard Latin [Italian], Which melts like kisses from a female mouth.
Byron, Beppo, st. 44.

4. A member of the Latin or Roman Catholic Church: the designation most frequently used by Greek Catholics and other Oriental Christians for Roman Catholics.

The Latins in Palestine are not numerous, the country villages, when Christian, belonging generally to the Greek Church. Encyc. Brit., XIII. 644.

5. A member of a civil community in Turkey composed of such subjects of the Sultan as are of foreign ancestry and of the Roman Catholic faith.—6†. An exercise in schools, consisting in turning English into Latin.

By mine aduice, he shall not vse the common order in common scholes, for making of latines.
Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 25.

The divisions and periods of the Latin vary more or less with different writers. As generally adopted, and as somewhat more precisely discriminated in this dictionary and systematically followed in the etymologies, they are here defined in chronological order: Old Latin, Latin before the classical period, including Plautus, Ennius, Terence, Cato, and other early Latin authors (so far as they retain traces of the older language), and inscriptions of early date.—Classical Latin, the Latin of the writers commonly called classical (Lucretius, Catullus, Cæsar, Cicero, Sallust, Virgil, Nepos, Horace, Ovid, Livy, Tibullus, Curtius, Persius, Petronius, Seneca, the Plinys, Statius, Tacitus, Juvenal, Suetonius, etc.), from about 75 B. C. to about A. D. 175 or 200; the standard Latin of the grammars and dictionaries.—Late Latin, Latin immediately following the classical period, from about A. D. 175 or 200 to about 600, including the writings of Ausonius, Claudian, Lampridius, Orosius, Cassiodorus, Boëthius, etc., and the early church fathers, Tertullian, Lactantius, Jerome, Augustine, etc.—Law Latin. See *law*¹.—Low Latin. See Middle Latin.—Middle Latin, or Medieval Latin, the Latin of the middle ages, from about A. D. 600 to 1500. During this period the Latin vocabulary received enormous accessions from the Greek and Teutonic and Oriental tongues, as well as from the Romance tongues, the vernacular representatives of the ancient Latin, such accessions being fully accommodated to the Latin, or merely provided with Latin terminations, or received unchanged. Also called Low Latin, sometimes Barbarous Latin, especially with reference to its foreign elements.—New Latin, or Modern Latin, Latin as written in modern times, from about A. D. 1500 to the present time. It now includes especially the Latin used by scientific writers in description and classification. New Latin, like Middle Latin, possesses a huge literature, but the language in this form is now used almost exclusively in theological, philological, and scientific works. Its main use is to serve, with the Greek vocabulary, now in large part incorporated in New Latin, as the common vocabulary of civilization, the tendency being in each civilized tongue to form the terms required by the progress of science upon an actual or potential New Latin type.—Thieves' Latin, thieves' language; thieves' cant or slang.

A very learned man, I promise you, and can vent Greek and Hebrew as fast as I can Thieves' Latin.
Scott, Kenilworth, xxix.

latitude (lat'i-tūd), n. [< ME. latitude, < OF. latitude, F. latitude = Sp. latitud = Pg. latitude = It. latitudine, < L. latitudo, breadth, width, < latus, broad, OL. stlatus (appearing in fem. stlata, a broad strip), ult. a var. of stratus, pp. of sternere, spread out, strew: see stratum, strew.]

1†. Extent from side to side, or distance sidewise from a given point or line; breadth; width.

Provided the length do not exceed the latitude above one third part. Sir H. Wotton, Elem. of Architecture.

Thy yet close-folded latitude of boughs. Cowper, Yardley Oak.

2. Extent within limits of any kind; scope; range; comprehensiveness: as, to be allowed great latitude of motion or action; latitude of meaning or of application.

This doctrine of elenches hath a more ample latitude and extent than is perceived. Bacon, Advancement of Learning, ii. 225.

Then, in comes the benign latitude of the doctrine of good-will, and cuts asunder all those hard pinching cords. South, Sermons.

The nation was less governed by laws than by customs, which admitted a great latitude of interpretation. Hume, Hist. Eng., I., App. 1.

Latitude of action should not be given to a relief party who on a known coast are searching for men who know their plans and orders. Schley and Soley, Rescue of Greely, p. 33.

Hence—3. Extent of deviation from a standard; freedom from rules or limits: as, latitude of conduct.

In human actions, there are no degrees and precise natural limits described, but a latitude is indulged. Jer. Taylor.

Augustus . . . reproved his daughter for her excess in apparel, and both rebuked and imprisoned her for her immodest latitudes. Penn, No Cross, No Crown, ii.

4. The elevation of the pole of the heavens at a station, or the angle at which the plane of the horizon is cut by the earth's axis; the total curvature or bending of a meridian between the equator and a station; the angle which the plumb-line at any place makes with the plumb-line at the equator in the same plane; on a map, the angular distance of a point on the earth's surface from the equator, measured on the meridian of the point: as, St. Paul's, London, is in lat. 51° 30′ 48″ N.; Cape Horn is in lat. 55° 59′ S. Latitude is determined by different methods, according as circumstances may require. At sea the instrument exclusively used is the quadrant or sextant, the latter being simply a more accurately constructed and therefore more expensive form of the instrument. With this the altitude of the sun is observed when on the meridian, and from this altitude, with the aid of the declination taken from the Nautical Almanac, with certain corrections for dip, refraction, etc., the latitude is obtained. The same method is used on land (with the aid of an artificial horizon in place of the natural) in cases where no great accuracy is required, as in ordinary geographical reconnaissances. More accurate results are secured by increasing the number of observations by the method of circummeridian altitudes, several observations being taken just before and just after noon (or, if a fixed star is observed, before and after its culmination), from which, with suitable corrections, a mean result is attained more accurate than that furnished by a single observation. A much higher degree of accuracy is reached by the use of the zenith-telescope, which is a portable instrument, but considerably less so than the sextant, which the observer holds in his hand. With this instrument the latitude is determined by measuring micrometrically the difference of the meridional zenith-distances of two stars near the zenith, one north and the other south of it. The most accurate method of determining the latitude in a fixed observatory is by observing, with the meridian circle, the altitude of a circumpolar star at its transits above and below the pole. This method is independent of the declination of the star, and not necessarily liable to great errors of refraction. Another method sometimes employed in fixed observatories is to observe the transit of a star with a transit-instrument in the prime vertical, the time of the transit being observed with the instrument pointing east, and again with the same instrument pointing west, whence the altitude of the pole may be deduced. There are other methods of determining the latitude, but they are much less important than those mentioned. Latitude thus instrumentally determined is called astronomical latitude, in distinction from geocentric and geodetic latitudes.

5. In astron., the angular distance of a star north or south of the ecliptic, measured on that secondary to the ecliptic which passes through the body. Secondaries to the ecliptic are called circles of celestial latitude, and parallels to the ecliptic are called parallels of celestial latitude. Latitude is geocentric or heliocentric according as the earth or the sun is taken as the center from which the angle is measured.

6. The quantity of the interval between two latitudes, either in the geographical or the astronomical sense: as, to sail through 30° of latitude.

The zodiak in hevene is ymagened to ben a superfice contienyng a latitude of 12 degrees. Chaucer, Astrolabe, i. 21.

7. A place or region as marked by parallels of latitude: as, to fish in high latitudes (that is, in places where the latitude is a high number); the orange will not ripen in this latitude (that is, it will not do so in any place on the same parallel of latitude as the place spoken of); you are out of your latitude (that is, literally or figuratively, you have committed an error of navigation, so that the latitude you have assigned to the ship's place is not the true one).

Those latitudes and altitudes where no crops will grow. W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 1st ser., p. 103.

Argument of the latitude. See argument.—Ascending latitude. See ascending.—Calm latitudes. See calm[1].—Celestial latitude. See def. 5, above.—Circle of latitude. See circle.—Geocentric, reduced, or central latitude, the angle, measured at the center of the earth, between a straight line to any place and the line to the equator in the same meridian.—Heliocentric latitude. See heliocentric.—Heliographic latitude. See heliographic.—Latitude by account (naut.), the latitude deduced from the course and distance sailed since the last observation.—Latitude by observation (naut.), the latitude deduced from an observation of some heavenly body.—Middle latitude, in nav., the latitude of the parallel midway between two places situated in the same hemisphere. It is equal to half the sum of the latitudes of the two places when they are on the same side of the equator; when they are on opposite sides, it is equal to half the difference of their latitudes.—Middle-latitude sailing, a combination of plane and parallel sailing, so named from the use of the middle latitude—that is, the latitude of the parallel which is equally distant from the parallel left and the one arrived at. See sailing.—Parallel of latitude. Same as circle of latitude (b).

latitudinal (lat-i-tū′di-nal), a. [= Sp. latitudinal, < L. latitudo (-din-), breadth, + -al.] Pertaining to latitude; being in the direction of latitude.

latitudinarian (lat-i-tū-di-nā′ri-an), a. and n. [Cf. F. latitudinaire; < NL. latitudinarius, < L. latitudo (-din-), breadth: see latitude.] I. a. 1. Embracing a wide circle or range; having free scope; not conforming to a strict code of morals; roving; libertine.

Latitudinarian love will be expensive, and therefore I would be informed what is to be gotten by it.
Jeremy Collier, Kindness.

2. Characterized by latitude or independence of thought, or by forbearance from strict insistence upon the usual standards of belief or opinion; especially, not rigidly strict in religious principles or views; tolerant of free-thinking or heresy: as, latitudinarian opinions or doctrines. The word is generally used opprobriously. It is specifically applied in church history to certain Episcopal divines of the seventeenth century (see below), but in later time to all who regard specific creeds, methods of church government, and forms of worship with comparative indifference.

A man bred among Dutch Presbyterians, and well known to hold latitudinarian opinions about robes, ceremonies, and bishops. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., vii.

Men of broad views, of tolerant, if not latitudinarian, temper. H. N. Oxenham, Short Studies, p. 9.

Locke . . . was a theologian, and a sincere if latitudinarian Christian. Leslie Stephen, Eng. Thought, i. § 21.

II. n. 1. In Eng. church hist., one of a school of Episcopal divines who in the seventeenth century strove to unite the dissenters with the Episcopal Church by insisting only on those doctrines which were held in common by both, and who, while they maintained the wisdom of the episcopal form of government and ritual, denied their divine origin and authority.

They wished that things might have been carried with more moderation, and they continued to keep up a good correspondence with those who differed from them in opinion, and allowed a great freedom both in philosophy and in divinity; from whence they were called "men of latitude"; and upon this men of narrow thoughts fastened upon them the name of latitudinarians. Bp. Burnet.

2. Hence, in later times, one who regards with comparative indifference specific creeds, methods of church government, and forms of public worship: generally used opprobriously.

latitudinarianism (lat-i-tū-di-nā′ri-an-izm), n. [< latitudinarian + -ism.] The doctrine of a latitudinarian or of the latitudinarians; freedom or liberality of opinion in religion, philosophy, politics, etc.; laxity or indifference in regard to doctrines and forms.

He [Jortin] was a lover of truth, without hovering over the gloomy abyss of scepticism; and a friend to free enquiry, without roving into the dreary and pathless wilds of latitudinarianism. Parr, Tracts by a Warburtonian.

Fierce sectarianism bred fierce latitudinarianism.
De Quincey.

Extreme contrasts of doctrine have come to be openly treated as simply differences of opinion, Sacerdotalism and Latitudinarianism finding a common home in an undivided Church. Contemporary Rev., L. 21.

latitudinous (lat-i-tū′di-nus), a. [< L. latitudo (-din-), breadth: see latitude.] Very broad; having a wide extent or scope.

latont, n. A Middle English form of latten. Chaucer.

Latona (lā-tō′nä), n. [L., < Gr. Λητώ, Doric Λατώ: see def.] 1. In classical myth., the Roman name of the Greek goddess Leto, mother by Jupiter of Apollo and Diana. See Leto.

Mygale, the symbol of Latona or Night.
Knight, Anc. Art and Myth. (1876), p. 57.

2. In zoöl.: (a) A genus of mollusks. (b) A genus of cladocerous crustaceans of the family Sididæ. (c) A genus of rove-beetles or Staphylinidæ having the anterior tarsi dilated. There are two species, both from the United States of Colombia. Guérin, 1844. (d) A genus of spiders. C. Koch, 1866.

latonert, n. A Middle English form of lattener. York Plays.

latount, n. A Middle English form of latten. Chaucer.

latrant† (lā′trant), a. [= It. latrante, < L. latran(t-)s, ppr. of latrare, bark.] Barking; clamoring noisily.

Whose latrant stomachs oft molest
The deep-laid plans their dreams suggest.
M. Green, The Spleen.

Thy care be first the various gifts to trace,
The minds and genius of the latrant race.
Tickell, Hunting.

latrate† (lā′trāt), v. i. [< L. latratus, pp. of latrare, bark.] To bark, as a dog.

latration† (lā-trā′shon), n. [< L. as if latratio(n-),* < latrare, bark: see latrate.] A barking, as of a dog.

Latreillean (lä-trā′lē-an), a. [< Latreille (see def.) + -an.] Pertaining to the French naturalist Pierre André Latreille (1762–1833).

Latreillia (lä-trā′li-ä), n. [NL., named after Latreille, the French naturalist.] 1. A genus of crustaceans. Roux, 1827.—2. A genus of Muscidæ. Desvoidy, 1830.

latreutical (la-trö′ti-kal), a. [< MGr. λατρευτικός,* of or for divine service, < Gr. λατρεύειν, serve, work for hire, < λάτρις, a hired servant: see latria.] 1. Acting in the capacity of a servant; ministering; serving. [Rare.]

That in this sacred supper there is a sacrifice in that sense wherein the fathers spake, none of us ever doubted: but that is then either latreutical, as Bellarmin distinguishes it not ill, or eucharistical.
Bp. Hall, No Peace with Rome, § 4.

2. Relating to or in the nature of latria.

latria (lā-trī′ä), n. [= F. latrie = Sp. latría = Pg. It. latria, < LL. latria, < Gr. λατρεία, service, divine worship, < λατρεύειν, serve for hire, serve God with prayers, etc., < λάτρις, a hired servant; cf. L. latro(n-), a mercenary, a robber: see ladrone.] In Rom. Cath. theol., a technical term for that supreme worship which is allowed to be offered to God only: distinguished from dulia and hyperdulia.

Latrididæ (lā-trid′i-dē), n. pl. [NL.] The usual but an irregular form of Lathridiidæ.

Latridius, n. See Lathridius.

latrine (la-trēn′), n. [= F. latrine = Sp. Pg. It. latrina, < L. latrina (also neut. latrinum), contr. of lavatrina, a bath, a water-closet, < lavare, wash: see *lave*2, lotion.] A privy; a water-closet; especially, a water-closet in a public place, as in factories, schools, barracks, hospitals, etc.

Across the gardens were the latrines for the domestics, and, some distance away from these on the same side, the laundries. Quoted in Nineteenth Century, XXIV. 847.

Latris (lā′tris), n. [NL., < L. Latris, a female proper name, < Gr. λάτρις, a workman for hire, in fem. a handmaid.] A genus of fishes of the family Cirritidæ. L. hecateia is a New Zealand species, known as the trumpeter, and highly esteemed for its flesh. J. Richardson.

latrobe (la-trōb′), n. [Short for Latrobe stove; so called from its inventor, J. H. B. Latrobe of Baltimore.] A form of stove which is set into a fireplace, has a projecting ornamental front, and is arranged for heating floors above by means of a hot-air flue fitted with a damper and register. E. H. Knight. Also called Baltimore heater.

latrobite (la-trō′bīt), n. [Named after C. I. Latrobe, Chester.] A pink or rose-red variety of anorthite, or lime feldspar, from Labrador.

latrocinary (lat′rō-si-nā-ri), a. [< latrocin-y + -ary.] Practising highway robbery.

In our viatorial progression we were now opposite the Portobello, where latrocinary homicides wont to lurk.
Campbell, Lexiphanes (ed. 1767), p. 56.

latrocination† (lat″rō-si-nā′shon), n. [< L. latrocinatio(n-), highway robbery, < latrocinari, be a hired servant, practise freebooting: see latrocinium.] The act of robbing; a depredation. E. Phillips, 1706.

latrocinium (lat-rō-sin′i-um), n. [L.: see latrociny, larceny.] 1†. Larceny; theft.—2. [cap.] In church hist., a council held at Ephesus (A. D. 449), at which action was taken in favor of the heretic Eutyches (see Eutychian): so called because its measures were carried by force and intimidation. All its acts were reversed at the ecumenical council of Chalcedon, two years later. Also called the Ephesian Latrocinium, and the robber council or synod. 3†. The prerogative of sitting in judgment upon and executing thieves.

latrociny† (lat′rō-si-ni), n. [= Sp. Pg. It. latrocinio, < L. latrocinium, military service, robbery, < latrocinari, be a hired servant, practise freebooting, < latro(n-), a mercenary, a robber; cf. Gr. λάτρις, a hired servant: see latria, ladrone, and cf. larceny, a reduced form of the same word.] Larceny; theft. Stackhouse.

Latrodectus (lat-rō-dek′tus), n. [NL.] A genus of retitelarian spiders, of the family Theridiidæ. See Malmignatte.

lattage (lat′āj), n. [A dial. var. of lettage,* < *let*2 + -age.] An impediment: generally applied to a defect in speech. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

latteen, a. See lateen.

latten (lat′en), n. [Early mod. E. also latton, laton, laten;* < ME. laton, latoun, latun (= Russ. latunŭ), < OF. laton, F. laiton, latten, = Sp. latón = Pg. latão, brass, metal in thin plates, < Sp. lata, lath, = Pg. lata, tin-plate, < G. latte, a lath, a thin plate: see *lath*1.] 1. A mixed metal, made of copper and zinc and not practically distinguishable from brass. Such a metal was used throughout the middle ages and later, commonly in thin sheets, for the manufacture of various utensils, and for the brasses of sepulchral monuments. The term appears to be now restricted to kinds of brass that are worked into articles for ecclesiastical use.

He hadde a croys of latoun ful of stones.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 699.

The doores or gates are couered with fine Latten of Corinth: one of which (they imagine) was made of the wood of Noahs Arke. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 298.

The candlestick was seven-branched, made of laton or brass, so that it could be easily set up or taken to pieces again. Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. i. 244.

2. Same as latten-brass.—Black latten, a dark-colored latten in milled sheets, sometimes beaten into wire.—Gold latten. See gold.—Latten wire, wire made from strips of latten beaten with a mallet until round. Such wire was made before the introduction of wire-drawing machines.—Roll latten, latten polished on both sides ready for use. Simmonds.—Shaven latten, a thinner kind of latten.

latten-brass (lat′en-brȧs), n. A metallic compound into which scrap-brass and other ingredients enter, and which is rolled in thin plates.

lattener (lat′en-ėr), n. A worker in latten.

latter (lat′ėr), a. [A var. of later (= OFries. letora, letera, littera, worse, later, = MHG. lazzer, later, = Icel. latari, comp. of latr, lazy), compar. of late, now partly differentiated in use: see *late*1.] 1. Later; more advanced or more recent; nearer to the close or to the present time: as, the latter part of the day, or of one's life; in these latter days.

Hear counsel, and receive instruction, that thou mayest be wise in thy latter end. Prov. xix. 20.

2. Coming after another person or thing in consideration or relation; being the second of two or of a dual division in order of existence or of mention: opposed to former: as, I prefer the latter proposition to the former.

I hold it ever,
Virtue and cunning were endowments greater Than nobleness and riches; careless heirs
May the two latter darken and expend.
Shak., Pericles, iii. 2. 29.

This was the opinion and practice of the latter Cato.
Swift, Sent. of Ch. of Eng. Man, i.

3†. Last; latest; final.

Direct mine arms, I may embrace his neck,
And in his bosom spend my latter gasp.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., ii. 5. 38.

Latter end, Lammas, etc. See the nouns.—The former and the latter rain. See rain.

latter-born† (lat′ėr-bôrn), a. Born later; younger.

My wife, more careful for the latter-born,
Had fasten'd him unto a small spare mast.
Shak., C. of E., i. 1. 79.

latter-day (lat′ėr-dā), a. Belonging to recent or present times, as opposed to early or former periods.

Two charming expressions of another of Mr. Lang's latterday moods. The Academy, Dec. 29, 1888, p. 396.

Abraham, wandering off and founding a clan which becomes in time as distinct as any that ever existed, foreshadows our latter-day divergences.
Contemporary Rev., LIII. 403.

Latter-day Saints, Mormons: so called by themselves. See Mormon.

latter-kin (lat′ėr-kin), n. A pointed piece of hard wood used for clearing out the grooves of the cames or leaden frames in fretwork-glazing. E. H. Knight.

latterly (lat′ėr-li), adv. Of late; lately; at a late or recent time.

It was by crushing a formidable resistance of this kind that Taiko acquired his ascendancy latterly. Brougham.

lattermath (lat′ėr-màth), n. [< latter + math.] The latter mowing; aftermath. [Rare.]

The latter-math has less substance, succulence, and fragrance than the summer crop. Landor.

latter-mint (lat′ėr-mint), n. A late kind of mint.

Savory, latter-mint, and columbines.
Keats, Endymion, iv.

lattermore† (lat'ėr-mōr), a. See latermore.

lattern† (lat'ėrn), n. [See lectern.] Same as ★lectern.

lattice (lat'is), n. [Early mod. E. also lattise, lattis; < ME. latis, < OF. lattis, F. lattis, a lattice, < latte, a lath: see lath[1].] 1. Work with open spaces formed by crossing, interlacing, or joining laths, bars, or rods of wood or metal.

Lattice-window.

So, my good window of lattice, fare thee well: thy casement I need not open, for I look through thee.
Shak., All's Well, ii. [3. 225.

The upper part of the window, which is most commonly shut, is made of glasse or lattise.
Coryat, Crudities, [I. 50.

2. Anything made of or covered with strips interwoven so as to form a sort of network; specifically, a window, window-blind, or screen made of laths or strips which cross one another like network, so as to leave open interstices. Lattices are used especially when air rather than light is to be admitted. They were once general in England. Also lattice-blind, lattice-window.

Holding a lattis still before his face,
Through which he still did peep as forward he did pace.
Spenser, F. Q., III. xii. 15.

The mother of Sisera looked out at a window and cried through the lattice, Why is his chariot so long in coming?
Judges v. 28.

Backward the lattice-blind she flung.
Tennyson, Mariana in the South.

3. In her., a bearing representing a series of perpendicular and horizontal strips crossing one another over the field or a part of it. These strips may be interlaced or not, and if interlaced should be so blazoned. A lattice differs from a surface fretty in being palewise and barwise, while fretty is always bendwise. According to some writers, the lattice should never be interlaced, and it is allowed by them that the strips may be bendwise, dexter and sinister, the difference between this and a surface fretty being in the circumstance that they do not interlace.—Red lattice†, a frame of lattice-work painted bright-red, formerly used to fill the windows of an ale-house: considered a sign or mark of a tavern.

His Saint Valerio,
That knows not of what fashion dice are made,
Nor ever yet look'd towards a red lattice.
Chapman, All Fools, v. 1.

A' calls me e'en now, my lord, through a red lattice, and I could discern no part of his face from the window.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 2. 86.

lattice (lat'is), v. t.; pret. and pp. latticed, ppr. latticing. [< lattice, n.] 1. To furnish with a lattice.

The windows were latticed with small panes.
Longfellow, Hyperion, iv. 5.

2. To give the form or appearance of a lattice to.

O'er their heads
Huge alders weave their canopies, and shed
Disparted moonlight through the latticed boughs.
Glover, Athenaid, xxvii.

Every morning when the sun peeps through
The dim, leaf-latticed windows of the grove.
Longfellow, Birds of Killingworth.

Latticed cells, in bot., same as cambiform cells. See cambiform.—Latticed leaves, in bot., cancellate leaves. See cancellate.—To lattice up†, to hide from the light of day; render obscure; eclipse.

Alexander was adorned with most excellent vertues. . . . Therein it seemeth he hath latticed up Cæsar.
North, tr. of Plutarch, p. 621.

lattice-blind (lat'is-blīnd), n. Same as lattice, 2.

lattice-braid (lat'is-brād), n. A narrow braid made on the lace-pillow and having the appearance of a fine lattice, all the principal openings being of the same size.

lattice-bridge (lat'is-brij), n. A bridge in which the web between the chords, or the combination of the main compression and tension members, is formed so as to resemble lattice-work. It is a frequent form of construction in Europe, where bridges of this kind have been built of more than 300 feet span. In these bridges the tendency to lateral deflection, due to the lightness of the web, is counteracted by making the trusses double and properly connected, thus forming a kind of openwork box-girder. See cut under ★bridge[1].

lattice-girder (lat'is-gėr″dėr), n. A girder of which the web consists of diagonal pieces arranged like latticework.

latticeleaf (lat'is-lēf), n. A name of the Madagascar water-plants Aponogeton (Ouvirandra) fenestralis and A. Bernerianus (Ouvirandra Berneriana). They are remarkable for their skeleton leaves, the cellular tissue between the veins being wanting. The fleshy root is farinaceous and edible, resembling that of the yam. Also called lattice-plant and laceleaf.

Latticeleaf (Aponogeton fenestralis).

lattice-moss (lat'is-môs), n. A moss, Cinclidotus fontinaloides: so called from the perforated membrane which unites the peristome with the columella.

lattice-plant (lat'is-plant), n. Same as lattice-leaf.

lattice-truss (lat'is-trus), n. In bridge-building, carp., etc., a truss consisting of upper and lower horizontal chords, connected by braces crossing each other, and generally stiffened by joining the braces where they intersect.

lattice-window (lat'is-win″dō), n. Same as lattice, 2.

They [galleys] are made with lattise windows all round, and have swivel cannon fasten'd towards the prow.
Pococke, Description of the East, I. 16.

latticework (lat'is-wėrk), n. 1. A grating formed of crossing strips with small openings. Compare lattice, 1.

These supplied
Of texture firm a lattice-work, that brac'd
The new machine, and it became a chair.
Cowper, Task, i. 42.

2. In embroidery, the outline of a lattice, done in outline-stitch on solid material, and employed as a background.

latticinio (It. pron. lät-tē-chē'ni-ō), n. [It., < L. lacticinium, milk food: see lacticinium.] In glass-manuf., a name given to opaque white ★glass used in decorative designs.

latus (lā'tus), n.; pl. latera (lat'e-rą). [L., side, flank: see lateral, etc.] Side: used in some mathematical terms designating a line or diameter.—Latus primarium of a conic section, a diameter of a circular section touching the vertex of the conic.—Latus rectum. (a) Originally, a straight line drawn between two curves so as to bisect all straight lines drawn from one to the other parallel to a given straight line. (b) A straight line drawn from the vertex of a conic at right angles to the transverse diameter, and having a length equal to the diameter of that circular section which is at the same distance from the vertex of the cone as is the plane of the conic.—Latus transversum of a conic, the transverse diameter.

laubanite (lâ'ban-īt), n. [< Lauban (see def.) + -ite[2].] A zeolitic mineral occurring in fibrous spherical forms of a snow-white color in basalt at Lauban in Silesia. It is near laumontite in composition.

lauch[1] (lâch), v. and n. A Scotch form of laugh.

lauch[2] (läch), n. A Scotch form of law[1].

Aweel, aweel, Maggie, ilka land has its ain lauch.
Scott, Antiquary, xxvi.

laud (lâd), n. [= F. los (> ME. los, loos, lose: see lose[2]) = Sp. laude = It. laude, lode, < L. laus (laud-), praise, glory, fame, renown, prob. orig. claus* (claud-*) (= W. clod = Ir. clōth, praise), akin to cluere, hear, inclutus, famous, renowned: see client and loud.] 1. Praise; commendation; honorable mention. [Now rare.]

He was, if I shal geven hym his laude,
A theef and eek a somnour, and a baud.
Chaucer, Friar's Tale, l. 55.

Who sometimes rayseth vp his voice to the height of the heauens, in singing the laudes of the immortall God.
Sir P. Sidney, Apol. for Poetrie.

War. 'Tis called Jerusalem, my noble lord.

About the year 1470, one John Watson, a student in grammar, obtained a concession to be graduated and laureated in that science.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, II. 129.

Obverse, the bust of the king laureated and draped; inscription, "Georgius III. Dei Gratia Rex."
N. and Q., 7th ser., VI. 338.

2. To invest with the office of poet laureate.

★ Pope.

laureate (lâ'rē-āt), a. and n. [Formerly also laureat; < ME. laureate = OF. laureé, F. lauréat = Sp. Pg. laureado = It. laureato, < L. laureatus, crowned with laurel: see laureate, v.] I. a. 1. Crowned with laurel as a mark of distinction; decked with laurel.

Fraunceys Petrark, the laureat poete,
Highte this clerk, whos rethoryke swete Enlumined al Itaille of poetrye.
Chaucer, Prol. to Clerk's Tale, l. 31.

Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,
And daffadillies fill their cups with tears,
To strew the laureat herse where Lycid lies.
Milton, Lycidas, l. 151.

2. In numismatical descriptions, wearing a laurel wreath: said of a human head, a bust, etc.: as, the head of the emperor Nero, laureate.—Poet laureate, formerly, a poet who had been publicly crowned with laurel by a sovereign or some other eminent person in recognition of his merits; also, a student in a university who had been so crowned on receiving an honorable degree in grammar, including poetry and rhetoric; now, in Great Britain, a salaried officer of the royal household, of whom no special duty is required, but who formerly was expected to furnish an ode annually for the sovereign's birthday, and to celebrate in verse great national events. The office of poet laureate seems to have existed with interruptions from the time of Edward III. or IV., but was first made permanent in 1630.

II. n. 1. One crowned with laurel; a poet laureate; an officially appointed or recognized poet.

Ah think, what poet best may make them known!
Or choose, at least, some minister of grace,
Fit to bestow the laureate's weighty place.
Pope, Imit. of Horace, II. i. 379.

2. In the musical conservatories of Paris and Brussels, a pupil who gains the Prix de Rome.

laureateship (lâ'rē-āt-ship), n. [< laureate, n., + -ship.] 1. The dignity or office of a laureate; the post of poet laureate.—2. In the English universities, formerly, a degree in grammar, including poetry and rhetoric: so called because the person who graduated was presented with a wreath of laurel. Halliwell.

laureation (lâ-rē-ā'shon), n. [= It. laureazione; as laureate, v., + -ion.] The act of crowning with laurel; the act of conferring a degree in a university, together with a wreath of laurel—an honor formerly conferred for excellence in grammar, including poetry and rhetoric.

For a notice of Skelton's laureation at Oxford the Rev. Dr. Bliss obligingly searched the archives of that university, but without success.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III. 268, note.

laurel (lâ'rel or lor'el), n. and a. [Formerly also lawrell; < ME. laurel, loral, loryel, lawriall, loryel*, var. of laurer, lorer, loryger = D. laurier,

< OF. laurier, F. laurier = Pr. Sp. laurel = Pg. loureiro, laurel, < ML. laurarius*, prop. adj., < L. laurus, the bay-tree, laurel: see laure.] I. n. 1. The bay-tree or bay-laurel, Laurus nobilis. This is the true laurel of the ancients and the poets.

The bole [of a tree] was of bright gold, bret to the myddes, Largior then a lawriall & lengur with all.
Destruction of Troy [(E. E. T. S.), l. 4960.

The antique Grecians used to lie along at their meals . . . upon beds that circled three parts of the table, . . . in their feastings crowned with chaplets of flowers and garlands of lawrell.
Sandys, Travailes, [p. 61.

Branch of Laurel (Laurus nobilis), with male flowers.
a, male flower with base of the inflorescence, showing two involucral leaves; b, female flower; c, stamen, showing the dehiscence of the anther; d, fruit.

2. Any species of the genus Laurus.—3. Any one of many diverse plants whose leaves suggest those of the true laurel. In English gardens the common laurel, or cherry-laurel, more properly laurel-cherry, is Prunus Lauro-Cerasus (see cherry[1]); the Portugal laurel is P. Lusitanica. The copse-, spurge-, or wood-laurel of England is Daphne Laureola. American laurel is the genus Kalmia, including the mountain-laurel of the eastern United States (K. latifolia), the lambkill or sheep-laurel (K. angustifolia), and the pale laurel or swamp-laurel (K. glauca). (See cut under Kalmia.) The great laurel of the same region is the rosebay, Rhododendron maximum; and the ground-laurel is the trailing arbutus, Epigæa repens. (See cut under Epigæa.) The white laurel, another swamp-laurel, of the Atlantic coast and the South, is Magnolia Virginiana, also called sweet-bay. Further south the big laurel, or bull-bay, is Magnolia fœtida. The Carolina cherry-laurel is Prunus Caroliniana. The California laurel or bay-tree, the mountain-laurel of the West, is Umbellularia Californica. The West Indian laurel is Prunus occidentalis; the West Indian seaside laurel, Phyllanthus latifolius, P. Epiphyllanthus, and P. linearis. The Japanese laurel, cultivated in several varieties, is Aucuba Japonica of the dogwood family. The Tasmanian laurel is Anopterus glandulosus. 4. A crown of laurel; hence, honors acquired; claims to or tokens of distinction or glory: often in the plural: as, to win laurels in battle.

Their temples wreath'd with leaves that still renew;
For deathless laurel is the victor's due.
Dryden, Flower and Leaf, l. 541.

No other fame can be compared with that of Jesus. . . . All other laurels wither before his.
Channing, Perfect Life, p. 225.

The laurels of Miltiades would not suffer Themistocles to sleep. Sumner, Fame and Glory.

5. An English gold coin worth 20 shillings, or about 5 dollars, first issued in 1619 by James I.: so called because the head of the king was wreathed with laurel, and not crowned, as on earlier English coins. It was also called broad, unite, and jacobus. See cut under broad, n.— 6. A salmon which has remained in fresh water during the summer.

II. a. Pertaining to or consisting of laurel: as, a laurel wreath.

laurel-bottle (lâ′rel-bot″l), n. A bottle partly filled with crushed leaves of the common laurel, used by entomologists for killing insects. The fumes of the laurel-leaves are almost instantly fatal even to species of large size.

laurel-cherry (lâ′rel-cher″i), n. See cherry[1], 1.

laureled, laurelled (lâ′reld or lor′eld), a. [< laurel + -ed[2].] Crowned or decorated with laurel, or with a laurel wreath; laureate.

Those laurel'd chiefs were men of mighty fame.
Dryden, Flower and Leaf, l. 534.

laurel-oil (lâ′rel-oil), n. Same as bay-oil.

laurel-shrub (lâ′rel-shrub), n. The laurel.

Every spicy flower
Of the laurel-shrubs that hedge it round.
Tennyson, The Poet's Mind.

laurel-tree (lâ′rel-trē), n. The laurel.

laurel-water (lâ′rel-wâ″tėr), n. A medicinal water distilled from the leaves of the cherry-laurel. It is employed in Europe as a sedative narcotic, identical in its properties with a dilute solution of hydrocyanic acid. U. S. Dispensatory.

Laurentian (lâ-ren′shiạn), a. and n. [< Lawrence, ML. Laurentius (see defs.), + -ian.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to Laurentius or Lorenzo dei Medici, or to the Laurentian Library in Florence, named from him.—2. Of or pertaining to the Laurentide mountains: applied in geology, in 1854, by Sir W. E. Logan, to a series of rocks occupying an extensive area in Quebec and Ontario, and previously called by him the metamorphic series. The researches of the Canadian geologists, more especially Sir W. E. Logan, about the middle of the nineteenth century, showed that in the region north of the St. Lawrence river and the Great Lakes, and particularly in the height of land known as the Laurentide mountains, the oldest rocks in the geological column occur. They lie beneath all those containing recognizable fossils. They were subdivided by Logan into a Huronian system above, and a Laurentian system below. These two were collectively called archæan by J. D. Dana, although various names such as primary, primitive, azoic, eozoic, etc., had been used by previous writers. Dana's usage is generally followed to-day. The Laurentian was further subdivided by Logan, from above downward, into the Grenville series, the Norian series, and the Ottawa gneiss. Cf. Archæan, ★Algonkian, azoic, eozoic, Huronian. —Laurentian Library, a celebrated library at Florence, founded by Pope Clement VII. (1523–34) from previous collections of the Medici family, to which he belonged, and named in honor of Lorenzo de' Medici. It contains many rare books, but is famous chiefly for its large collection of early and valuable manuscripts. Also called the Medicean or the Mediceo-Laurentian Library.

II. n. In geol., the Laurentian series.

laureole† (lâ′rē-ōl), n. [Early mod. E. lauriel, < ME. lauriol, < OF. laureole, < F. lauréole = Sp. lauréola = Pg. It. laureola, the laureole, < L. laureola, a little laurel garland, a laurel-branch, dim. of laurea, a laurel garland, fem. of laureus, of laurel, < laurus, laurel: see laurel.] Spurge-laurel, Daphne Laureola.

Lauriol, centaure, and fumetere.
Chaucer, Nun's Priest's Tale, l. 143.

laurer†, n. [ME., also lawrer, lorer, var. of laurel, q. v.] The laurel.

laurer-crowned†, a. Crowned with laurel. Chaucer, Troilus, v. 1107.

laurestine (lâ′res-tin), n. Same as laurustine.

lauriel†, n. See laureole.

lauriferous (lâ-rif′ẹ-rus), a. [= Sp. laurífero = It. laurifero, < L. laurus, laurel, + ferre = E. bear[1].] Producing or carrying laurel. Coles, 1717.

laurin (lâ′rin), n. [< L. laurus, laurel, + -in[2].] A fatty crystalline principle ($C_{22}H_{30}O_3$) contained in the berries of the laurel.

laurine (lâ′rin), a. [ME. lauryne, < OF. laurin, < L. laurinus, of laurel, < laurus, laurel: see laure, laurel.] Of laurel.

As oil lauryne is lentiscyne of take,
Whoos vigour hoot water must underslake.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 59.

Laurineæ (lâ-rin′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL., < Laurus + -ineæ.] The name first applied by Jussieu in 1805 to the Lauraceæ or laurel family, typified by the genus Laurus. It was used by de Candolle (1813), by Endlicher (1837), and by Bentham and Hooker (1880). Since it has not the proper termination for family names Lindley's name Lauraceæ (1847) is now adopted. It contains 47 genera divided into two subfamilies and seven tribes. The Hernandiaceæ, formerly included in this family, are now regarded as distinct. The plants of this family have strong properties, usually aromatic or medicinal. To it belong, besides the laurel, the genera Cinnamomum (producing cinnamon and camphor) and Sassafras, as well as other plants of economic importance.

Laurinium (lâ-rin′i-um), n. [NL. (Unger, 1845), < Laurus + -inium.] The generic name applied to fossil wood having an internal structure resembling that of Laurus.

Laurinoxylon (lâ-rin-ok′si-lon), n. [NL. (Felix), < Laurus (Laurinium) + Gr. ξύλον, wood.] See Laurinium.

laurionite (lâ′ri-on-īt), n. [Irreg. < Laurion (see def.) + -ite[2].] An oxychlorid of lead occurring in prismatic crystals at Laurium (Laurion), Greece, and produced by the action of sea-water upon the ancient lead slags.

laurite (lâ′rīt), n. [So called by Wöhler, a German chemist, after a lady whose Christian name was Laura.] A sulphid of osmium and ruthenium, a rare mineral, occurring in regular octahedrons, of an iron-black color and bright metallic luster, found in the platinum-washings of Borneo. It occurs also in Oregon.

laurize† (lâ′rīz), v. t. [< L. laurus, laurel, + -ize.] To crown with laurel; laureate.

Our humble notes, though little noted now,
Lauriz'd hereafter.
Sylvester, Posthumous Sonnets, iii.

Laurophyllum (lâ-rō-fil′um), n. [NL. (Göppert, 1854), < Laurus + Gr. φύλλον, leaf.] The generic name given to fossil leaves having the shape and nervation of those of Laurus, with which genus, however, their identity has not been established. Such leaves are found in the Tertiary of Italy, Java, and New Zealand, and in the Cretaceous of Kansas and the British Northwest Territories.

Laurus (lâ′rus), n. [NL. use of L. laurus, the laurel-tree, applied by Linnæus to the genus: see laurel.] A genus of apetalous trees, type of the family Lauraceæ and of the tribe Laureæ. It is characterized by polygamous flowers in clusters of four together in an involucre, a perianth of 4 segments, and usually 12 to 20 stamens. Only 2 living species are known, one, L. nobilis, the true laurel, inhabiting the Mediterranean region, the other, L. Canariensis, confined to the Canary Islands and Madeira. They are small trees having alternate, entire, evergreen leaves, with the flower-clusters borne in their axils. The fruit is an ovoid berry. (See laurel.) An immense number of fossil leaves agreeing in all essential respects with those of Laurus have been found, ranging from the Lower Cretaceous of the British Northwest Territory and the Middle Cretaceous of Kansas, Greenland, and Bohemia to the Pliocene and Quaternary of Europe, showing clearly that the plants of this genus and closely related types were much more abundant formerly than now. L. Canariensis also existed on the continent of Europe in Pliocene time.

laurustine (lâ′rus-tin), n. [Also laurestine; < NL. laurustinus: see laurustinus.] Same as laurustinus.

laurustinus (lâ-rus-tī′nus), n. [NL., orig. Laurus Tinus: L. laurus, laurel; tinus, a plant, Viburnum Tinus.] A plant, Viburnum Tinus, a popular evergreen garden shrub or tree, native in southern Europe.

laust†, a. A Middle English variant of loose. Chaucer.

lauset†, v. A Middle English variant of lose[1].

lautitious† (lâ-tish′us), a. [< L. lautitia, elegance, splendor, magnificence, < lautus, neat, elegant, splendid, lit. washed, pp. of lavare, wash: see lave[2].] Sumptuous.

To sup with thee thou did'st me home invite,
And mad'st a promise that mine appetite
Sho'd meet and tire on such lautitious meat,
The like not Heliogabalus did eat.
Herrick, The Invitation.

★lava (lä′vạ), n. [= D. G. Dan. Sw. lava = F. lave = Sp. Pg. lava, < It. lava, a stream, esp. of molten rock, < lavare, wash, < L. lavare, wash: see lave[2].] Molten rock which issues from a volcano during an eruption; the same when cooled and hardened. Lavas after hardening differ much in structure and texture. Some are entirely made up of an interlaced mass of crystals, others are entirely vitreous, as in the case of obsidian or volcanic glass. Others, again, have a partially glassy matrix, in which crystals are embedded—this last being the most common arrangement. Lavas also vary much in respect to compactness; some have an open cellular structure, while others are very compact. The specific gravity of lava varies in the different kinds from 2.37 to 3.22. The heavier or more basic kinds contain much magnetite or titaniferous iron, together with augite and olivin. These contain from 45 to 50 per cent. of silica, and to this class belong the basalts, dolerites, and nepheline and leucite lavas. The lighter or more acid varieties of lava contain from 60 to 80 per cent. or more of silica. In this class are included the trachytes and rhyolites, as well as most of the pitchstones, obsidians, and pumice. There are also varieties intermediate between the acid and the basic, such as augite andesite and hornblende andesite. Many volcanoes—at least during certain stages of their existence—throw out fragmentary materials only, and these are sometimes ejected during the same period of activity in which molten lava is poured forth. Among these fragmentary materials ashes, sand, lapilli, and even large angular masses occur. Portions of the molten material within the pipe of the crater are sometimes hurled aloft, and fall in the form of bombs, or in rough irregular masses, like furnace-slag. Some volcanoes consist entirely of these fragmentary materials; others are chiefly made up of lava which became consolidated after ejection; in many cases, however, the mass of the cone has been built up by alternations of fragmentary and fluid material, and the whole is frequently bound together by dikes and sheets of lava forced into cracks formed during the operation.—Lava millstone, a hard and coarse basaltic millstone, obtained from quarries near Andernach on the Rhine. Simmonds.—Lava-ware, a kind of coarse ware resembling lava, made from iron slag, cast into urns, tiles, table-tops, etc.

★lavabo (lạ-vā′bō), n. [< L. lavabo, 1st pers. sing. fut. ind. of lavare, wash: see lave[2].] 1. Eccles., in the Roman Catholic Church, and in many Anglican churches, the ritual act of washing the celebrant's hands after the offertory and before entering upon the more solemn part of the eucharistic service: so called from the priest's reciting at the time the last part of the 26th psalm, beginning with the sixth verse, "I will wash my hands in innocency," in Latin, "Lavabo manus meas in innocentia." In the Greek Church this takes place in the prothesis, before vesting.—2. In many monasteries of the middle ages, a large stone basin from which the water issued by a number of small orifices around the edge, for the convenient performance of ablutions before religious exercises or meals. The lavabo was usually placed in a room, itself called lavabo, adjoining the cloister, and sometimes, as at the Cistercian Abbey of Fontenay, was the occasion of noteworthy architectural dispositions. Also known in medieval times as lavatorium. Hence—3. A convenience of similar object and arrangement in some modern schools or institutions; a lavatory.

lavage[1]†, a. An obsolete form of lavish. Cath. Angl., p. 210.

lavage[2] (lā′vāj), n. [= F. lavage = Pg. lavagem; as lave[2] + -age.] A laving or washing; in med., the process of cleansing by injection of fluids; specifically, the washing out of the stomach, as in gastritis.

Lavage of the stomach has accomplished . . . wonderful results in the treatment of gastric affections.
Therapeutic Gazette, VIII. 530.

lavalto†, n. An obsolete variant of lavolta.

lavander†, n. See lavender[1].

Lavandula (la-van′dū-lă), n. [NL. (Linnæus), < ML. lavandula, lavendula, lavender: see lavender[2].] A genus of labiate plants, in which the lavenders are contained, type and only genus of the tribe Lavanduleæ. It is characterized by having the calyx tubular (with 13 to 15 striæ) and 5-toothed, and small flowers in spikes. There are about 20 species, chiefly natives of the Mediterranean region, but ranging from the Canary Islands to India. They are perennial herbs, undershrubs, or shrubs, with the leaves often crowded at the base, and whorls of flowers, blue or violet, arranged in cylindrical spikes, and subtended by bracts which are often large and colored. See lavender[2].

Lavender (Lavandula Spica).
1, lower part of plant; 2, inflorescence; a, flower; b, pistil.

Lavanduleæ (lav-an-dū′lē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Lavandula + -eæ.] A tribe of labiate plants. It is characterized by having the lobes of the corolla nearly equal, the upper lip twice cleft, the lower thrice cleft, and the stamens included within the tube of the corolla. It embraces the genus Lavandula, or lavender-plants, only.

lavange†, n. [Cf. OF. lavache, lavace, lavasse, a heavy rain, an inundation, < laver, wash: see lave[2].] Same as lavant.

lavant (lā′vant), n. [Also levant; appar. < OF. lavant (applied to a spring), ppr. of laver, wash: see lave[2]. Cf. lavange.] A shallow and more or less intermittent spring. [Prov. Eng.]

The land-springs, which we call lavants, break out much on the downs of Sussex, Hampshire, and Wiltshire.
Gilbert White, Nat. Hist. of Selborne, ii. 19.

lavaret (lav′a-ret), n. [F.] A kind of whitefish, Coregonus lavaretus, found in European lakes, as of Switzerland, Germany, and Sweden. Also called adelfisch.

lavast, a. An obsolete form of lavish.

Lavatera (la-vā′te-rā), n. [NL. (Tournefort, 1700), dedicated to Lavater, a Swiss physician and naturalist.] A genus of malvaceous plants of the tribe Malveæ, subtribe Malvinæ. It is closely related to Malva, the true mallows, but differs from that genus in having from 6 to 9 bractlets under the flowers (united at the base), and in the projecting, dilated carpels. There are about 20 species, chiefly natives of the Mediterranean region and western Europe, but 2 occur on the Canary Islands, 1 in central Asia, and 1 in Australia. They are tomentose or hirsute herbs, shrubs, or small trees, with angled or lobed leaves, and variously colored flowers, either solitary in the axils or in terminal racemes. L. arborea, the best-known species, is the tree-mallow or sea-mallow of Europe, which grows wild on the rocky coasts from Spain to Scotland. In cultivation it attains a height of 8 or 10 feet. It has pale purple-red flowers in long racemes at the ends of the annually flowering branches. It contains an abundance of mucilaginous matter, and yields a poor fiber. In common with other soft-leafed malvaceous plants, it is sometimes called velvetleaf. Nearly all the species of this genus are sometimes cultivated.

lavatic (lä-vat′ik), a. [< lava + -atic[1].] Consisting of or resembling lava; lavic.

lavation (lā-vā′shon), n. [= OF. lavacion = Sp. lavación = It. lavazione, < L. lavatio(n-), a bath, < lavare, wash: see lave[2].] A washing or cleansing.

Such filthy stuffe was by loose lewd varlets sung before her [Berecynthia's] charet on the solemne day of her lavation. Hakewill, Apology, IV. i. § 7.

Opposite to these are placed the appurtenances of lavation, richly wrought in frosted silver.
Carlyle, Sartor Resartus, p. 197.

Dryden, tr. of Ovid's Metamorph., xi. 448.

2. To draw, as water; drink in.

He [Orpheus] . . . soong in wepyng al that ever he hadde resseyvyd and laved [tr. L. hauserat] out of the noble welles of his modyr Calyope the goddes.
Chaucer, Boëthius, iii. meter 12.

3. To give bountifully; lavish.

He lauez his gyftez as water of dyche.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), i. 607.

II. intrans. 1. To run down or gutter, as a candle. [Prov. Eng.]—2. To hang or flap down. Compare lave-eared. [Prov. Eng.]

His ears hang laving like a new lugg'd swine.
Bp. Hall, Satires, IV. i. 72.

lave[2] (lāv), v.; pret. and pp. laved, ppr. laving. [< ME. laven, < OF. laver, F. laver = Sp. Pg. lavar = It. lavare, < L. lavare (pp. lautus, lotus, lavatus), wash, bathe, akin to luere, wash, bathe, = Gr. λούειν, wash, bathe. From L. lavare come also E. lava, lavender[1], lavender[2], launder, laundry, etc., lotion, etc., and from luere, E. ablution, alluvium, deluge, diluvial, dilute, etc.] I. trans. To wash; bathe.

My house within the city
Is richly furnished with plate and gold;
Basins, and ewers, to lave her dainty hands.
Shak., T. of the S., ii. 1. 350.

The left presents a place of graves,
Whose wall the silent water laves.
Parnell, A Night Piece, Death.

II. intrans. 1. To wash one's self; bathe.

Ever since I heedlessly did lave
In thy deceitful stream. Keats, Endymion, ii.

2. To serve for washing or bathing; wash or flow as against something.

But, as I rose out of the laving stream,
Heaven open'd her eternal doors.
Milton, P. R., i. 280.

These waters blue that round you lave. Byron.

lave[3] (lāv), n. [< ME. lave, laif, lafe, < AS. lāf (= OS. lēba = OFries. lava = OHG. leiba, leipa, MHG. leibe = Icel. leif, pl. leifar = Dan. lev (frequent in local names: Hadersl*ev*, Snoldel*öv*, etc.) = Goth. laiba), what is left, < lifan*, remain: see leave[1].] What is left; the remainder; the rest. [Scotch.]

We had better lose ane than lose a' the lave.
Archie of Ca'field (Child's Ballads, VI. 93).

Weel pleased to think her bairn 's respected like the lave.
Burns, Cottar's Saturday Night.

lave-eared (lāv′ērd), a. Long-eared; flap-eared. [Prov. Eng.]

A lave-ear'd asse with gold may trapped be.
Bp. Hall, Satires, II. ii. 64.

laveer† (la-vēr′), v. i. [= G. lavieren, laviren, < D. laveeren, now laveren, tack, laveer, < OF. louvier, F. louvoyer, beat to windward, luff, < louf, lof, loof, luff: see loof[2], luff.] Naut., to sail back and forth; tack.

But those that 'gainst stiff gales laveering go Must be at once resolv'd and skilful too.
Dryden, Astræa Redux, l. 65.

laveerer†, n. One who tacks or works up against the wind.

They [the schoolmen] are the best laveerers in the world, and would have taught a ship to have catched the wind, that it should have gained half in half, though it had been contrary. Clarendon, Essays, I. 253.

lavel (lā′vel), n. [Prob. a var. of label.] The flap that covers the top of the windpipe. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

lave-lugged (lāv′lugd), a. Same as lave-eared. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

lavement† (lāv′ment), n. [< F. lavement = Pr. lavament = Sp. lavamiento = Pg. It. lavamento; as lave[2] + -ment.] 1. The act of laving; a washing or bathing.—2. A clyster.

lavender[1]† (lav′en-dėr), n. [< ME. lavender, lavyndere, lavander, lavendre (also contr. launder, launderre, landar, > mod. E. launder), < OF. lavandier, lavendier, m., lavandiere, lavendiere, f., = Sp. lavandero, lavandera = Pg. lavandeira, = It. lavandajo, m., lavandaja, lavandara, f., < ML. lavandarius, m., lavandaria, lavanderia, f., a washer, < L. lavandus, gerundive of lavare, wash: see laver[2].] A washer; a washerwoman; a laundress.

Envye ys lavendere of the court alway;
For she ne parteth neither nyght ne day
Out of the hous of Cesar, thus saith Daunte.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 357.

lavender[1] (lav′en-dėr), v. t. [< lavender, n. Cf. launder, v.] To launder; wash. [An archaism.]

Conceiting that the smell of soap, from the lavendering in the back-yard, gave a stain to such flowers . . . as were born there. N. P. Willis, New Mirror (1843).

★ lavender[2] (lav′en-dėr), n. and a. [< ME. lavendere, lavendre, lavandre = OF. lavendre* = Sp. (obs.) lavándula = It. lavandola = D. lavendel = MHG. lavendele, lavendel, G. lavendel = Dan. Sw. lavendel, < ML. lavandula, lavendula, lavender; also F. lavande, < It. lavanda, lavender, < lavanda, a washing (so called, as variously stated, because used in washing, or because laid in freshly washed linen, or because its distilled water is used), < lavare, < L. lavare, wash: see lave[2].] I. n. 1. An aromatic plant of the genus Lavandula, primarily L. Spica, the true lavender, which is used as a perfume. See Lavandula.

Here's flowers for you;
Hot lavender, mints, savory, marjoram.
Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 104.

Crowned lilies, standing near Purple-spiked lavender.
Tennyson, Ode to Memory.

2. The color of lavender-blossoms; a very pale lilac-color, which in consequence of its paleness appears less reddish. A mixture of color-disks $\frac{7}{8}$ white + $\frac{1}{8}$ artificial ultramarine + $\frac{1}{16}$ vermilion gives a lavender. A very pale lavender is called a lavender-gray; a still paler color a French white.—Oil of lavender, or lavender-oil, an essential oil obtained by distillation from the flowers and flower-stems of lavender. It is an aromatic stimulant and tonic. An inferior lavender-oil, called oil of spike, is yielded by Lavandula Spica, which, together with that from L. Stœchas, is used by porcelain-painters and artists in the preparation of their varnishes.—French lavender, Lavandula Spica.—Sea-lavender, the plant Limonium Limonium.—To lay in lavender, (a) To lay by carefully, as clothes, with sprigs of lavender.

And a black sattin suit of his own to go before her in; which suit (for the more sweet'ning) now lies in lavender.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, iii. 3.

Hence—(b†) To put in pledge; pawn. [Old slang.]

To lay to pawne, as we say to lay in lavender. Florio.

Good faith, rather than thou shouldst pawn a rag more, I'll lay my ladyship in lavender, if I knew where.
Marston, Jonson, and Chapman, Eastward Ho.

II. a. Of the color of lavender-blossoms; very pale lilac.

A pair of lavender gloves which fitted her exactly.
Yates, Land at Last, I. 219.

lavender[2] (lav'en-dėr), v. t. [< lavender[2], n.] To sprinkle or scent with lavender.

The solemn clerk goes lavendered and shorn.
Hood, Two Peacocks of Bedfont, st. 25.

It shall be all my study for one hour
To rose and lavender my horsiness.
Tennyson, Queen Mary, iii. 5.

lavender-water (lav'en-dėr-wâ″tėr), n. A liquor used as a perfume, composed of spirits of wine, essential oil of lavender, and ambergris.

lavendrey†, n. An obsolete form of laundry. Halliwell.

laventine (lav'en-tin), n. A thin silk, used especially for sleeve-linings.

laver[1] (lā'vėr), n. [Formerly also lavor; < ME. laver, lavour (= D. lavoor, > G. lavor), < OF. lavor, lavur, laveor, laveour, lavoir, F. lavoir, < LL. lavatorium, a place for washing: see lavatory.] 1. A basin, bowl, trough, or cistern to wash in. The laver mentioned in the Old Testament was a large basin which stood upon a foot or pedestal in the court of the Jewish tabernacle, and subsequently in the temple, and contained water for the ablutions of the priests, and for the washing of the sacrifices in the temple service.

Basyns, lavours eek, or men hem bye.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 287.

Thou shalt also make a laver of brass. . . . Aaron and his sons shall wash their hands and their feet thereat.
Ex. xxx. 18.

It gushes into three ample lavors rais'd about with stone.
Evelyn, Diary, Nov. 12, 1644.

2. In her., a colter or plowshare when used as a bearing.

laver[2] (lā'vėr), n. [< L. laver, a water-plant, also called sion.] 1. Either of two species of algæ of the genus Porphyra, P. laciniata and P. vulgaris, known in Ireland and Scotland as sloke or sloakan. They are used as food, either stewed or pickled, and eaten with pepper, vinegar, and oil; and they are said to be useful in scrofulous affections and glandular swellings. Also laverwort.

2. A dish composed of one of the above algæ or of some similar seaweed. See laver-bread.—Green laver, Ulva latissima and U. Lactuca, used for the same purposes as Porphyra laciniata or P. vulgaris, but inferior.—Purple laver, a general name in England for plants of the genus Porphyra.

laver[3]†, a. [Cf. lave[1], v. i., 2.] Hanging.

Let his laver lip
Speak in reproach of nature's workmanship.
Marston, Satires, v. 159.

laver-bread (lā'vėr-bred), n. A sort of food made from green laver (Ulva latissima): sometimes called oyster-green.

laverock (lav'ėr-ok), n. [Also lavrock, leverock: see lark[1].] An obsolete or dialectal form of lark[1].

There mighte men see many flokkes
Of turtles and laverrokes. Rom. of Rose, l. 662.

Now lav'rocks wake the merry morn,
Aloft on dewy wing.
Burns, Lament of Mary Queen of Scots.

Sandy laverock, the sand-lark or ring-plover, Ægialites hiaticula; also the common sandpiper, Tringoides hypoleucus. Also called water-laverock.

laver-pot (lā'vėr-pot), n. In her., a ewer when used as a bearing.

laverwort (lā'vėr-wėrt), n. Same as laver[2], 1.

lavic (lā'vik), a. [= F. lavique; as lava + -ic.] Relating to or like lava.

lavish (lav'ish), a. [Early mod. E. also (appar. by corruption) lavis, laves, lavas; also in another formation lavy[1], q. v.; < ME. lavish*, lavage; < lave[1] + -ish[1].] 1. Expending or bestowing with profusion; profuse; prodigal: as, to be lavish of expense, of praise, or of blood.

She, of her favourite place the pride and joy,
Of charms at once most lavish and most coy.
Crabbe.

He was ambitious of acquisitions, but lavish in expenditure. Prescott, Ferd. and Isa., i. 15.

2. Unrestrained; wild.

In al other thing so light and laves [are they] of theyr tonge. Sir T. More, Works, p. 250.

When his headstrong riot hath no curb,
When rage and hot blood are his counsellors,
When means and lavish manners meet together.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 4. 64.

Lewd and lavish act of sin. Milton, Comus, l. 465.

3. Expended or bestowed with prodigality or in profuseness; existing in or characterized by profusion; superabundant.

Let her have needful, but not lavish, means.
Shak., M. for M., ii. 2. 24.

For lavish grants suppose a monarch tame,
And more his goodness than his wit proclaim.
Dryden, Abs. and Achit., i. 385.

The eyes that smiled through lavish locks.
Whittier, Hermit of the Thebaid.

4. Rank, as grass, etc. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

=Syn. 1 and 3. Profuse, etc. See extravagant.

lavish (lav'ish), v. t. [< lavish, a.] To expend or bestow with profusion; give or lay out prodigally: as, to lavish encomiums on a person; to lavish money on a friend, or for gratification.

Where western gales eternally reside,
And all the seasons lavish all their pride.
Addison, Letter from Italy.

Even as a war minister, Pitt is scarcely entitled to all the praise which his contemporaries lavished on him.
Macaulay, William Pitt.

lavish† (lav'ish), n. [< lavish, v.] Waste; squandering.

Such lavish will I make of Turkish blood.
Marlowe, Tamburlaine, II., i. 3.

Would Atropos would cut my vital thread,
And so make lavish of my loathed life.
Wily Beguiled (Hawkins's Eng. Dramas, III. 323).

lavisher (lav'ish-ėr), n. One who lavishes; one who expends or bestows profusely or excessively; a prodigal.

God is not a lavisher, but a dispenser of his blessings.
Fotherby, Atheomastix, p. 189.

lavishly (lav'ish-li), adv. In a lavish manner; with profuse expense; prodigally.

lavishment (lav'ish-ment), n. [< lavish + -ment.] The act of lavishing; profuse bestowal or expenditure; prodigality.

Ah, happy realm the while
That by no officer's lewd lavishment,
With greedy lust and wrong, consumed art.
P. Fletcher, Purple Island, vi.

lavishness (lav'ish-nes), n. The state or quality of being lavish; profusion; prodigality.

First got with guile, and then preserv'd with dread,
And after spent with pride and lavishnesse.
Spenser, F. Q., II. vii. 12.

lavolt† (la-volt'), n. [< lavolta.] Same as lavolta.

I cannot sing,
Nor heel the high lavolt.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 4. 88.

lavolta† (la-vol'tä), n. [Also, erroneously, lavalto; < It. la volta, the turn: la, the (< L. illa, that); volta, a turning round: see vault, n.] A lively round dance, of Italian origin, popular in England in the time of Elizabeth and later. It probably resembled the polka or the waltz.

For lo! the liveless Jacks lavaltoes take
At that sweet musick which themselves do make.
Brome's Songs (ed. 1661), p. 133. (Halliwell.)

They bid us to the English dancing-schools,
And teach lavoltas high, and swift corantos.
Shak., Hen. V., iii. 5. 33.

lavolta† (la-vol'tä), v. i. [Also, erroneously, lavolto; < lavolta, n.] To spring or whirl as in the lavolta.

Do but marke him on your walles, any morning at that season, how he sallies and lavoltos.
Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (Harl. Misc., VI. 164).

lavolteter† (la-vol'tē-tėr), n. [For lavoltateer*, < lavolta + -t- (a mere insertion) + -eer.] One who dances the lavolta; a dancer.

The second, a lavoltetere, a saltatory, a dancer with a kit at his bum; one that, by teaching great madonnas to foot it, has miraculously purchased a ribanded waistcoat.
Beau. and Fl., Fair Maid of the Inn, iii. 1.

lavolto†, v. i. See lavolta.

lavor†, lavour†, n. Obsolete forms of laver[1].

lavrock (lav'rok), n. A variant of laverock, for lark[1].

lavy[1] (lā'vi), a. [< lave[1] + -y[1]. See lavish.] Lavish; liberal. Halliwell. [North. Eng. and Scotch.]

lavy[2] (lā'vi), n.; pl. lavies (-viz). Same as lamy.

law[1] (lâ), n. [< ME. lawe, laghe, laze, lahe, < *AS. lagu (rare, the usual words being æ, L. jus, and dōm, L. decretum, statutum) = OS. lag = Icel. lög (for lagu*), law (cf. lag, a stratum, order), = Sw. lag = Dan. lov, a law (cf. L. lex (leg-), a law, from the same ult. root); lit. 'that which lies' or is fixed or set (cf. G. gesetz, AS. gesetnes, a law, dōm, a law, doom, Gr. θεσμός, law, L. statutum, a statute, all of similar etymological import), < licgan (pret. læg), lie: see lie[1].] 1. A rule of action prescribed by authority, especially by a sovereign or by the state: as, the laws of Manu; a law of God.

We must define Laws to be Rules of Conduct which we are morally bound to obey, . . . or, more briefly, Commands imposed by Rightful Authority.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 269.

Our human laws are but the copies, more or less imperfect, of the eternal laws so far as we can read them, and either succeed and promote our welfare, or fail and bring confusion and disaster, according as the legislator's insight has detected the true principle, or has been distorted by ignorance or selfishness. Froude.

Specifically—(a) Any written or positive rule, or collection of rules, prescribed under the authority of the state or nation, whether by the people in its constitution, as the organic law, or by the legislature in its statute law, or by the treaty-making power, or by municipalities in their ordinances or by-laws.

It is essential to the idea of a law that it be attended with a sanction; or, in other words, a penalty or punishment for disobedience. A. Hamilton, Federalist, No. 15.

(b) An act of the supreme legislative body of a state or nation, as distinguished from the constitution: as, the constitution, and the laws made in pursuance thereof. (c) In a more general sense, the profession or vocation of attorneys, counsellors, solicitors, conveyancers, etc.: as, to practise law. (d) Litigation: as, to go to law.

Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust? 1 Cor. vi. 1.

2. Collectively, a system or collection of such rules. Specifically—(a) The principles and regulations of human government in their application to property and conduct; those general rules of external human action which are enforced by a sovereign political authority (Holland); the aggregate of rules set by men as politically superior or sovereign, to men as politically subject (Austin); rules of human conduct prescribed by established usage or custom, or by a constitution adopted by the people, or by statutes or ordinances prescribed by a legislative power, or by regulations of judicial procedure, or recognized and enforced by judicial decision. Modern difference of opinion as to the proper definition of law chiefly results from the fact that writers of the analytic school, proceeding by an analysis of the usual mental conception of law under monarchical government, have commonly defined it as in essence command by a superior to an inferior; and as perhaps the larger part of modern law—such, for instance, as the law of negotiable paper and of contracts generally—does not consist of commands or prohibitions, this definition is supported by the argument that what the sovereign permits he commands, or at least indirectly commands, shall not be prevented. Writers of the historical school, on the other hand, tracing government by law back to its early development, have defined law as essentially consisting of what is judicially ascertained to be usual and regular. In either view it is agreed that a true law in the sense of jurisprudence is one which deals with a class of things, acts or omissions, as distinguished from particular commands and awards. Law, as it actually exists in modern society, is the aggregate or system of rules by which a political community or congeries of communities regulates or professes to regulate the conduct and the rights and powers of its members and its own interference with their freedom; and any rule answering this description is, if authoritatively promulgated, a law. Every new judicial decision, also, is part of the law in the sense that it actually regulates conduct, rights, or powers. (b) The system of law, often slightly personified: as, in the eye of the law; in the custody of the law; the law presumes or intends.

No man e'er felt the halter draw,
With good opinion of the law.
J. Trumbull, McFingal, iii. 490.

(c) The Mosaic system of rules and ordinances.

Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil.
Mat. v. 17.

Hence—(d) The books of the Bible containing this system; the books of the law.

After the reading of the law and the prophets, the rulers of the synagogue sent unto them. Acts xiii. 15.

(e) The preceptive part of the Bible, especially of the New Testament, in contradistinction to its promises.

And worche many Myracles, and preche and teche the Feythe and the Lawe of Cristene Men unto his Children.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 1.

Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ. Gal. vi. 2.

3. A proposition which expresses the constant or regular order of certain phenomena, or the constant mode of action of a force; a general formula or rule to which all things, or all things or phenomena within the limits of a certain class or group, conform, precisely and without exception; a rule to which events really tend to conform. A mere empirical formula which satisfies a series of observations sufficiently, but would not hold in extreme cases, is not considered as a law. A special fact is not a law; but a subordinate principle, as that planets revolve in ellipses, is or is not a law according to the shade of meaning with which that word is used.

I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind. Rom. vii. 23.

The laws of nature are the rules according to which effects are produced; but there must be a cause which operates according to these rules. The rules of navigation never steered a ship, nor the law of gravity never moved a planet. Reid.

Law means a rule which we have always found to hold good, and which we expect always will hold good.
Huxley, Lay Sermons, p. 340.

Thus the belief in an unchanging order — the belief in law, now spreading among the more cultivated throughout the civilized world, is a belief of which the primitive man is absolutely incapable.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Psychol., § 488.

4. One of the rules or principles by which anything is regulated: as, the laws of the turf; the laws of versification.—5. A rule according to which anything is produced: as, the mathematical law of a curve.—6. An allowance in distance or time granted to an animal in a chase, or to a weaker competitor in a race or other contest; permission given to one competitor to start a certain distance ahead of, or a certain time before, another, in order to equalize the chances of winning.

These late years of our Civil Wars have been very destructive unto them; and no wonder if no Law hath been given to Hares, when so little hath been observed toward men. Fuller, Worthies, Cambridgeshire.

Her Grace saw from a turret "sixteen bucks, all having fayre lawe, pulled downe with greyhounds in a laund or lawn." Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, p. 71.

"They're to have six minutes law."
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, i. 7.

7. Custom; manner. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—Act and operation of law, such a mode of the creation or transfer of rights as does not depend on the intention of the parties, but on rules of law, applied, it may be, irrespective of their intention. Thus, where an owner of land dies intestate, the title is cast upon the heir by act and operation of law; and where a man becomes bankrupt, his property may be divested by act and operation of law, as distinguished from a transfer by devise or voluntary act.—Adjective law, rules of procedure, as distinguished from substantive law (which see, below).—Agrarian laws. See agrarian.—Alien and sedition laws. See alien.—Avogadro's law, in physics, the law that equal volumes of different gases, under like conditions of pressure and temperature, contain the same number of molecules.—Baer's law. [Named from Karl Ernst Baer, 1792–1876.] The doctrine that the generation of an individual of a certain animal form is determined by two conditions: first, by a continuous perfecting of the animal body by means of an increasing histological and morphological differentiation, or an increasing number and diversity of tissues and organic forms; second (and at the same time), by the continual transition from a more general form of the type to one more specific.—Bankrupt laws, bankruptcy laws. See bankruptcy.—Bell's law, the law that the anterior spinal nerve-roots are motor and the posterior sensory.—Bode's law, an empirical law which approximately represents the relative distances of the planets from the sun. It was discovered by Titius of Wittenberg, but was brought to general notice by Bode in 1772:—Write a series of 4s. Let the first 4 stand for the distance of Mercury. To the second 4 add 3, to the third, 6, etc., each time doubling the number added. The resulting series of numbers will be 4, 7, 10, 16, 28, 52, 100, 196, and 388. 28 corresponds to the mean asteroid, 388 should correspond to Neptune, whose distance, however, is only 300 on this scale.—Boyle's law, in physics, the law that at any given temperature the volume of a given mass of gas varies inversely as the pressure which it bears. It was discovered by Robert Boyle, and published by him about 1662; but Edme Mariotte having published a book concerning it (about 1679), the law was for a long time called Mariotte's law.—Brehon laws. See brehon.—Canon law. See canon[1].—Case law, law established by judicial decision in particular cases, as distinguished from statute law. Thus, when the courts are applied to for redress under novel circumstances — as in certain instances of boycotting — for which no positive law exists, case law necessarily results whichever way the courts decide; for if they hold that the person aggrieved is entitled to injunction or damages, they establish the unlawfulness of the act complained of; and if they decide that the action cannot be maintained, because there is no positive law to sustain it, they establish the lawfulness of the act, and, as a consequence, the lawfulness of incidental agreements to combine or render services in the promotion of such an act. The great body of the common law has grown up thus as case law, constantly modified, however, by statutes, which in their turn commonly give rise to new developments of case law called forth by controversy as to the interpretation and application of the statutory provisions.—Charles's law, the law that equal increments of temperature add equal amounts to the product of the volume and pressure of a given mass of gas. It was discovered by the French physicist Jacques Alexandre César Charles (1746–1823), the inventor of the Charliere or hydrogen balloon, but was formerly often attributed to Dalton and to Gay-Lussac.

Charles's law — that, if the temperature be varied while the pressure upon the gas remains the same, the gas increases by $\frac{1}{273}$d of its volume at zero centigrade for every degree of centigrade added to the temperature, or, which in combination with Boyle's law is the same thing, that if the density be constant, the pressure is directly proportional to the temperature measured from the point −273° centigrade, this point being called the zero of absolute temperature. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 611.

Cincian law, in Rom. hist., a law passed under the tribune M. Cincius Alimentus, 204 B. C., forbidding an advocate to receive compensation for the pleading of a case, and restricting ill-considered or unwise gifts of any nature by requiring certain legal forms of gift to be observed in almost all cases. The law was confirmed by a senatus consultum under Augustus, and so modified under Claudius as to permit a restricted compensation to lawyers.—Civil, commercial, common, consuetudinary, criminal law. See the adjectives.—Conclusion of law. See conclusion.—Conflict of laws. See conflict.—Crowner's quest law. See crowner[2].—Crown law. See crown, a.—Customary law. Same as consuetudinary law.—Dalton's law, a law enunciated by John Dalton, that in a mixture of gases which do not enter into chemical reaction, but are in equilibrium, the total pressure is the same as the sum of the pressures which would be exerted by each constituent if the others were not present. The ordinary statement that each portion of gas behaves as a vacuum to all the rest is in a sense true, but tends to convey a wrong idea.—Due process of law. See due[1].—Dulong and Petit's law, in physics, the law that the product of the specific heat of any element in the solid state multiplied by its atomic weight is (approximately) constant; or, in other words, that the different elementary substances have (nearly) the same atomic heat.—Ecclesiastical law. See ecclesiastical.—Eight-hour law See hour.—Empirical law. See empirical.—Enforcement law, a United States statute of 1870 (16 Stat., 140) for enforcing the right of citizens to vote, and punishing offenses against the equal enjoyment of suffrage. It was specially directed to the protection of emancipated slaves recently admitted to citizenship.—Exceptive law. See exceptive.—Ex post facto law. See ex post facto.—Falk laws. Same as May laws.—Faraday's laws, in elect., certain principles established by Faraday governing the electrolysis of compounds. The most important are: (1) that the quantity of an electrolyte decomposed in a given time is proportional to the strength of the current; (2) that the weights of the elements separated are proportional to their chemical equivalents; and (3) that the strength of the electrolytic action is the same for cells in any part of the same circuit.—Fechner's psychophysical law, the law that as the force of stimulus or excitation increases geometrically the intensity of sensation increases arithmetically, so that sensation is proportional to the logarithm of excitation. Thus, if with a given degree of attention we just perceive the difference between the sensations of pressure produced by 1 pound and 1.1 pounds, we shall also just perceive the difference produced by 2 pounds and 2.2 pounds. The sensed differences of sensation are the same, as are the differences of the logarithms of the stimuli. According to Fechner, the total sensation varies directly with the logarithm of the stimulus divided by the stimulus just sufficient to give an appreciable sensation, or $s = k \log \frac{r}{r'}$. This is Fechner's formula.—Federal law, that law which is prescribed by the supreme power in the United States, and regulates the organization of the federal government and its intercourse with the people, and that of the people with each other in matters of a national character, or with citizens of foreign states, as distinguished from state law, or that which is prescribed by the supreme power in any individual state, and regulates, in all matters not of a national character, the intercourse of such state with its own people, and that of its people among themselves. Robinson.—Forest law, formal law, Galilean law. See the adjectives.—Four years' limitation law. See limitation.—Fugitive-slave law. See fugitive.—Gay-Lussac's law. Same as Charles's law.—General law, law not local, nor confined in application to particular persons; a statute so expressed as to be capable of application throughout the jurisdiction of the lawgiver. Some controversy has existed as to whether the test is in the form of the law or in the existence of the subject to which it applies; but it is now generally held that a law which in terms purports to apply to all persons or places of a specified class throughout the state is a general law, although at the time when it is passed there may be only one such person or one such place in the state.—Gibbet law. See Halifax law.—Gothland sea laws. See laws of Wisby, below.—Gresham's law, in polit. econ., the tendency of the inferior of two forms or classes of currency in circulation together to circulate more freely than the superior: a law shortly stated in the maxim that "bad money drives out good." It results from the disposition of those who hold both to get rid of the inferior by passing it, and to hoard the superior, or, if coin, to select it for exportation. Named from Sir Thomas Gresham (1519?–1579), an English financier, who observed and commented on it.—Grimm's law, in philol., a law announced by Jacob Grimm, a great German philologist, though previously stated in part by Erasmus Rask, a Danish philologist, formulating certain changes or differences which the mute consonants undergo or exhibit in corresponding words in the Germanic or Teutonic branches of the Aryan family of languages. According to this law, stated briefly, the labials p, b, f in Greek, Latin, or Sanskrit become f, p, b in Gothic (with which English and the other Low German languages agree), and b (v), f, p in Old High German; the dentals t, d, th in Greek, etc., become th, t, d in Gothic, and d, z, t in Old High German; and the gutturals k, g, ch in Greek, etc., become h (not quite regularly), k, g in Gothic, and g, ch, k in Old High German. But the Old High German shifting (which is a second and much later shifting, beginning about A. D. 600, from the completed Low German shifting) is incomplete and not wholly regular; it is best exhibited among the dental mutes. The following table shows the changes and the usual correspondences: (1) Aryan (Sanskrit, Greek, Latin, etc.). (2) Low German (Gothic, Scandinavian, Anglo-Saxon, English, etc.). (3) High German (Old High German, Middle High German, New High German).

(1)	p	b	f(ph, bh)	t	d		th(dh)	k	g	ch(kh, gh)
(2)	f(b)	p	b		th	t	d	h	k	g
(3)	b(f, v)	f	p		d	z(ts)	t	g(h)	ch	k(g).

For example, Skt. pitri (pitar) = Gr. patēr = L. pater = Goth. fadar = OHG. vatar = E. father; Skt. tvam = Gr. τύ = L. tu = Goth. thu = OHG. du = E. thou; Skt. jānu (for gānu*) = Gr. γόνυ = L. genu = Goth. kniu = OHG. chniu, chneo = E. knee, etc. In the application of Grimm's law numerous inconsistencies and anomalies appear, due to interference, conformation, particular position or sequence of sounds, variations of accent, and other causes explained by other philological laws, or remaining in small part occult. The most important of these other laws is Verner's law (which see, below). See also the articles on the separate letters.—Haeckel's law, a concise statement of the fact that every individual organism, in its development from the ovum (or its ontogeny), goes through a series of evolutionary stages in each of which it represents a stage of the evolution of the class to which it belongs (the evolution of the class being phylogeny); and that every such organism "breeds true" (or shows palingeny) in so far as it is influenced by heredity, and becomes modified (or shows kenogeny) in so far as it is influenced by conditions of environment. See kenogeny, ontogeny, palingeny, and phylogeny.—Halifax law or inquest, a hasty trial followed by immediate punishment; an irrevocable punishment inflicted upon a summary trial without adequate opportunity of defense, so that subsequent proof of innocence becomes unavailing. The phrase originated from the so-called gibbet law or custom in the forest of Hardwick, coextensive with the parish of Halifax, England, under which the frith burghers summarily tried any one charged with stealing goods to the value of 13½*d.*, and could condemn him to be beheaded on the market-day.—Health laws. See health.—Heir at law. See heir.—Higher law, a law paramount to human law or statute. This phrase was used by William H. Seward in a speech in the United States Senate, March 11th, 1850, on the admission of California as a State, and became celebrated in connection with the slavery question, as intimating that, if the Constitution and laws did not condemn it, the law of a common humanity and justice should be appealed to.—Homestead law. See homestead.—Inheritance tax law. See inheritance.—Insolvent law. See insolvent.—International law. See international.—In the intendment of law. See intendment.—Issue of law. See issue, 10.—Joule's law, in elect., the law that the number of heat-units developed in a conductor is proportional to the product of the square of the strength of the current, the resistance of the conductor, and the time during which the current flows.—Judiciary law, that part of law the source and evidence of which is the adjudications of the courts, as distinguished from statutes or positive law. See case law, above.—Jurin's law, in physics, the law that the ascent of a given liquid in a capillary tube is inversely proportional to its diameter.—Kepler's laws, three laws of planetary motion, discovered by Johann Kepler (1571–1630), who announced the first two in his "De Motibus Stellæ Martis," in 1609, and discovered the third on March 8th, 1618. The three laws are as follows: (1) The orbits of the planets are ellipses having the sun at one focus. (2) The areas described by their radii vectores in equal times are equal. (3) The squares of their periodic times are proportional to the cubes of their mean distances from the sun.—Kirchhoff's laws, in elect., two laws stated as follows: (a) At any junction-point in a network of conductors the sum of all the currents which flow toward the junction is equal to the sum of all the currents which flow away from the junction (called the condition of continuity). (b) In any complete electric circuit the sum of the electromotive forces, reckoned in order round the circuit, is equal to the sum of the products of the current through and the resistance of each conductor forming the circuit.—Kopp's law of boiling-points. See boiling-point.—Law French, the form of Old French (Norman French) used in all common-law proceedings from the time of William the Conqueror to that of Edward III., and to some extent long afterward in certain formal state proceedings.—Law language, the technical phraseology used in legal writings and forms.—Law Latin, Latin as used in law and in legal documents. It is a mixture of Latin with Old French and English words adapted to Latin inflections.—Law merchant, commercial law; the body of principles and rules, drawn chiefly from the customs of merchants, by which the rights and obligations arising in commercial transactions are determined.—Law of absorption of light, the law that the proportion of homogeneous light transmitted varies geometrically as the thickness of the absorbing medium varies arithmetically.—Law of action and reaction, law of causation, law of citations, law of color. See action, causation, citation, color.—Law of contiguity. See contiguity, 3.—Law of continuity, of demand and supply, of equivalents. See continuity, demand, equivalent.—Law of disgregation, the law that the work of disgregation is proportional to the absolute temperature.—Law of error. See error, 5.—Law of evidence, of facility, of heterogeneity, of homogeneity, of integrity, of mortality, of nature. See evidence, etc.—Law of independence. See laws of motion, under motion.—Law of nations, international law. The phrase law of nations, originally adopted to designate those ethical principles of law deemed obligatory on all nations as the law of a particular nation is conceived as applicable to all persons within that nation, has been superseded by the more appropriate term international law (which see, under international), which includes the results of conventions and treaties.—Law of parsimony, the logical principle that we ought not to suppose the existence of anything not necessary to account for admitted facts.—Law of perseverance. See laws of motion, under motion.—Law of reciprocity of prime numbers, the proposition that if p and q are two prime numbers, then, if p is a quadratic residue of q, q is also a quadratic residue of p, unless both leave the remainder 3 when divided by 4, when, if p is a quadratic residue of q, then q is not a quadratic residue of p.—Law of the affinity of ideas. See affinity, 7.—Law of the Burgundians. See Papian code, under code.—Law of the flag, the law of the country to which a ship belongs.—Law of the forum. See forum.—Law of the land. (a) In constitutional provisions securing its protection to persons and property, due process of law.

By the law of the land is more clearly intended the general law which hears before it condemns; which proceeds upon inquiry, and renders judgment only after trial. The meaning is that any citizen shall hold his life, liberty, property, and immunities under the protection of general rules which govern society. D. Webster.

(b) The established law of a country.

As soon as a nation has assumed the obligations of international law, they become a portion of the law of the land to govern the decisions of courts, the conduct of the rulers, and that of the people.

by Eleanor, Duchess of Guienne, mother of Richard I. of England, and introduced into England with some additions in the reign of Richard I. (1189–99).—Laws of the Decemvirs. See Twelve Tables, under table.—Laws of the Hanse towns. See Hanse[1].—Laws of thermodynamics. See thermodynamics.—Laws of Wisby (or Wisbuy), a code or compilation of maritime customs and adjudications adopted in the island of Gothland in the Baltic sea, of which Wisby was the principal seaport. By the law-writers of the northern European nations it has been claimed that these laws were older than the laws of Oléron, but the better opinion seems to be that they were later and in some respects an improvement. The code was not established by legislative authority, but its provisions attained the sanction of general use and observance among the mariners of northern Europe. Sometimes called the Gothland sea laws.—Lenz's law, a law discovered by H. F. E. Lenz, according to which the currents induced in an electric circuit, by changes of the current in, or of the position of, an adjacent circuit through which a current is flowing, are always in such a direction as by their action on the inducing circuit to oppose the change.—Levitical law. See Levitical.—Lidford law, a punishment without trial. Compare Halifax law.—Local law. See statute.—Lynch law. See lynch-law.—Maine law, a prohibitory liquor law passed by the legislature of Maine in 1851, and permanently established in 1858.—Malice in law. See malice.—Mariotte's law. See Boyle's law.—Maritime, martial, mercantile, military, etc., law. See the adjectives.—Matter of law. See matter.—May laws, several Prussian statutes (1873–4), also called the Falk laws from the name of the introducer, restricting the action of the church, by forbidding it to impose civil penalties or pronounce against person, property, freedom, or good name of the citizen, or use its discipline against the law of the land, by extending state surveillance over monastic colleges, reformatories, etc., and removing hindrances to secession from any church. They were considerably modified in 1887.—Mersenne's laws. [Named from their discoverer, Marin Mersenne (1588–1648), a Franciscan monk.] Three laws showing the dependence of the time of vibration of a string upon its length, tension, and density: namely, that the time varies directly as the length and as the square root of the density, and inversely as the square root of the tension.—Mixed laws, Mosaic law, municipal law, natural law, naval law. See the adjectives.—Moral law, that portion of Old Testament law which relates to moral principles, especially the ten commandments.—Myrmidons of the law. See myrmidon.—Newton's law of cooling, the law that the quantity of heat lost by a body by radiation in a given time is proportional to the difference between its temperature and that of the surrounding medium. It holds very nearly true within certain narrow limits.—Normative law, a rule to which any process must conform in order to attain its end.—Ohm's law, in elect., an important law propounded by G. S. Ohm, giving an expression for the strength of an electric current, or the quantity of electricity passing in a given time, under certain conditions. It may be expressed as follows: the strength of an electric current, or the quantity of electricity passing a section of the conductor in a unit of time, is directly proportional to the whole electromotive force in operation, and inversely proportional to the sum of all the resistances in the circuit.—Organic law. See organic.—Periodic law, in chem. See periodic.—Policy of the law, the general purpose and spirit of the law: a phrase used to designate certain prohibitions applied by the courts, without positive statute enactment. Thus, a contract to combine in bidding at a judicial sale, so as to diminish competition, is held void as against the policy of the law, or as against public policy.—Political law. See political.—Poor law, poor laws, laws providing for the support of paupers at public expense. The general policy of such laws in England and the United States has been to provide for the local care of such persons as are unable to support themselves and have not relatives bound to support them, under the supervision of local officers in each parish, town, or county, with restrictions intended to prevent vagrancy and imposture, and to forbid the removal of the burden of support of any pauper from the town where he properly belongs to some other not properly responsible for him. The act which is regarded as the foundation of the system was passed in 1601 (43 Eliz., c. 2).—Positive law, law ordained by legislative power; human law; law which owes its force to human sanctions, as distinguished from divine law.—Presumption of law. See presumption.—Private law. See private.—Raines law, a law (named from Senator John Raines, its chief promoter), enacted in 1896 and frequently amended, governing the sale and taxation of liquors in the State of New York. Its provisions abolish local excise boards and substitute a State commissioner, provide for high taxation and local option, forbid sale or gift to minors under eighteen, etc.—Relief law, in U. S. hist., a law for the relief of debtors.—Revenue law. (a) A law which provides for the assessment and collection of a tax to defray the expenses of the government. Cooley. (b) More specifically, a law relating directly to the raising of the income of the government, as distinguished from one incidentally imposing fees, etc.—Roman law, the system of law developed by the ancient Romans: often also termed the civil law (which see, under civil).—Salic law. See Salic.—Sea laws, the maritime codes which grew up in the commercial ports of Europe in the early period of development of modern commerce. See laws of Oléron and laws of Wisby, above.—Special law. See general law, above, and statute.—State law. See federal law.—Statute law. See statute.—Substantive law, the rules of right which courts are called on to administer, as distinguished from rules of procedure or administration, called adjective law.—Sumptuary law, a law made to restrain excess in apparel, food, or any luxuries. Laws having only this object are now generally deemed objectionable as beyond the true province of civil legislation. The opponents of statutes in restraint of the liquor-traffic frequently stigmatize such statutes as "sumptuary laws." On the other hand, they are defended as a proper exercise of the police power of the state for the preservation of order and prevention of crime.—Ten-hour law. See hour.—Theological ceremonial law, that portion of the Old Testament law which relates to the Jewish rites and ceremonies.—To have the law of or on, to enforce the law against; go to law against. [Colloq.]

There's a hackney-coachman down stairs . . . vowing he'll have the law of you. Thackeray, Vanity Fair, vi.

To lay down the law. See down[2].—Town-bonding laws. See bond[1].—Verner's law, in philol., a law announced by Karl Verner of Copenhagen, in 1875, stating the effect of the position of accent in the shifting of the original Aryan mute consonants, and s, into Low German, and explaining the most important anomalies in the application of Grimm's law (see Grimm's law, above). Verner's law is in substance as follows: If the Aryan p, t, or k, or s immediately follows the position of the accent, it shifts regularly to the Low German f, th, or h, as stated in Grimm's law; but if it precedes the position of the accent, it becomes sonant—that is, p, t, k, s change to b, d, g, z. The law explains the apparent irregularity of Goth. fadar = AS. fæder = L. pater = Gr. πατήρ = Skt. pitar, etc., with the accent originally on the last syllable, and the Aryan t accordingly changed to Low German d by Verner's law, instead of Low German th, as Grimm's law would require, as against Goth. brōthar = AS. brōthor = Latin frater = Gr. φράτηρ = Skt. bhratar, with the accent originally on the first syllable, and the changes regular according to Grimm's law. It also explains the change of original s to z, from which, in Anglo-Saxon, etc., was developed r (as in lose, lorn, etc.). See rhotacism.—Wager of law. See wager.—Weber's law, in psychophysics, the statement that the variation of stimulus which produces the least appreciable variation in sensation maintains a fixed ratio to the total stimulus. It holds approximately for several senses.—Written law, statute law, as distinguished from the common law, or law resting in usage, custom, and the decisions of the courts. (As to noted laws on particular subjects, such as naturalization laws, preëmption laws, reconstruction laws, see the words characterizing the laws. See also act, article, bill, by-law, charter, code, decree, edict, ordinance, petition, provision, statute.)=Syn. Right, Equity, etc. (see justice); Law, Common Law, Statute, Enactment, Edict, Decree, Ordinance, Regulation, Canon. Law is the generic word, covering not only what is commanded by competent authority, but modes of action and orders of sequence: as, the Salic law; a law of rhetoric or logic; a law of nature; a law of character. Common law is that rule of action which has grown up from old usage and the decisions of judges. Statutes and enactments are laws made by legislative bodies; the slight difference between them is implied in their derivations. Edicts and decrees, on the other hand, are not legislative, but personal or executive acts, an edict being generally the command of a sovereign, and especially of an autocrat, while a decree is generally the order of an executive body or a court. Ordinance is very broad in its use, being applied to statutes (especially those of great importance: as, the ordinance of 1787), to decrees, to the local laws passed by city governments, etc. A regulation is a limited, subordinate, or temporary law or rule, perhaps applying to details of management or behavior, and often without expressed penalty for violation: as, army regulations; the regulations in a constitution. Canon is in this connection strictly an ecclesiastical term.

law[1] (lâ), v. [< ME. lawen*, lahen, < AS. lagian, make a law, ordain, < lagu, law: see law[1], n.] I. trans. 1†. To make a law; ordain.—2. To apply the law to; enforce the law against. [Colloq.]

I've got a regular hotel license. . . . There's been folks lawed in this town for sellin' a meal of victuals and not having one. C. D. Warner, Their Pilgrimage, p. 144.

3. To give law to; regulate; determine. [Rare.]

But for how long the flie may stang,
Let Inclination law that.
Burns, Jolly Beggars.

4†. In old English forest usage, to cut off the claws and balls of the fore feet of (a dog); mutilate the feet of, as a dog; expeditate.

And he whose dogge is not lawed and so founde, shalbe amerced, and shall pay for the same. iii. s.
Rastall, Collect. of Statutes, fol. 186, Charta de Forestâ.

II. intrans. 1. To go to law; litigate. [Obsolete or colloq.]

Sir Samuel Bernardiston brought a writ of error of this Exchequer chamber judgment into the House of Lords, and there the Knight lawed by himself, for no person opposed him. Roger North, Lord Guilford, I. 103.

Your husband 's . . . so given to lawing, they say, I doubt he'll leave you poorly off, when he dies.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, i. 9.

2†. To study law.

Let him law there: long as his ducats last, boy,
I'll grace him, and prefer him.
Fletcher, Spanish Curate, ii. 2.

law[2] (lâ), a. and v. An obsolete or dialectal (Scotch) form of low[2].

law[3] (lâ), n. A dialectal form of low[3].

law[4] (lâ), interj. A variation of la[1], or often of lord. Also laws.

law-abiding (lâ′ą-bī″ding), a. Abiding or standing by the law; obedient to law: as, law-abiding citizens.

law-binding (lâ′bīn″ding), n. In bookbinding, a binding in smooth sheep or calf of pale-brown color. Also known as law-sheep, law-calf.

law-blank (lâ′blangk), n. A printed form of a legal paper, as a summons, affidavit, writ, lease, etc., having blanks to be filled according to the circumstances of the case.

law-book (lâ′bůk), n. [< ME. lagheboc; < law[1] + book.] A book relating to law, or containing laws or reports of cases.

lawbreaker (lâ′brā″kėr), n. One who breaks or violates the law.

law-burrows (lâ′bur″ōz), n. In Scots law, a writ requiring one to give security against offering violence to another.

law-calf (lâ′kăf), n. See law-binding.

law-court (lâ′kōrt), n. A court of law.

law-daughter†, n. A daughter-in-law. [Rare.]

Hecuba . . . with an hundred Law-daughters. Stanihurst, Æneid, ii. 526.

law-day (lâ′dā), n. [< ME. lawdaye; < law[1] + day[1].] 1. A day of open court.—2†. A leet or sheriff's court.

That the Baillies put in execution alle ordinauncez of the . . . seid yelde and of the lawdayes.
English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 370.

3. A day appointed for the discharge of a bond, after which the debtor could not at common law be relieved from the forfeiture except by applying to a court of equity.

lawed†, a. An obsolete form of lewd.

lawer† (lâ′ėr), n. [< ME. lawer (also lawyer, q. v.); < law[1] + -er[1].] An obsolete form of lawyer.

Lawers hauynge greate desyr to confyrme and establyshe theyr opinions by the lawe of man, say, that it is shame to speake without lawe. Bible of 1551, Esd., Pref.

lawet (lâ′et), n. [Javanese.] The salangane or esculent swift, Collocalia esculenta.

law-father†, n. A father-in-law. [Rare.]

Next cooms thee lusty Chrorœbus, . . .
Soon to king Priamus by law: thus he lawfather helping.
Stanihurst, Æneid, ii. 354.

lawful (lâ′fůl), a. [< ME. laweful; < law[1] + -ful.] 1. Allowed by law; legitimate; not contrary to law; free from legal objection: as, that is deemed lawful which no law forbids; many things are lawful which are not expedient.

It shall not be lawfull . . . to cary and transport . . . any commodie of this Realme . . . but onely in English ships. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 371.

Behold, thy disciples do that which is not lawful to do upon the sabbath day. Mat. xii. 2.

2. Constituted or supported by law; capable of being enforced by law; rightful: as, lawful demands; the lawful owner of lands.

Burn, bonfires, clear and bright;
To entertain great England's lawful king.
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., v. 1. 4.

3. Possessing full legal rights.—Lawful age. See age, 3.—Lawful days. See day[1].—Lawful man or woman, in law, a man or woman free and capable of bearing oath. Stimson.—Lawful money, that money which is a legal tender in payment of debts.=Syn. 1. Allowable, permissible, regular.—1 and 2. Lawful, Legal, Legitimate, Licit, legalized, authorized, constitutional, just. Between lawful and legal there is really the same difference in breadth that there is between law and legislation or statute. (See law[1].) Legal is exact, meaning conformed to the law of the land, and having little figurative use: as, legal interest; a legal act. Lawful means not opposed to law, primarily to the law of the land, but with a good deal of freedom in figurative extension: it is unlike law, however, in always seeming figurative when carried beyond its primary meaning. Legitimate has as one of its primary meanings the idea of being born under law: as, a legitimate child; its other meanings are kindred. A legitimate inference is one that is drawn in conformity with the laws of truth or thought. That which is legitimate is generally something made or done in conformity to law, principle, justice, fairness, or propriety. Licit is rarely used except in the phrase licit or illicit; these words apply to that which is lawful or unlawful, or perhaps only legal or illegal, in trade, relations, or especially intercourse, illicit expressing much more opprobrium than unlawful or illegal. See criminal.

lawfully (lâ′fůl-i), adv. [< ME. lawfully; < lawful + -ly[2].] In a lawful manner; in accordance with law; without violating law; legally: as, we may lawfully do what the laws do not forbid.

lawfulness (lâ′fůl-nes), n. [< ME. laughfulnesse; < lawful + -ness.] The character of being lawful or conformable to law; legality; rightfulness: as, the lawfulness of an action does not always prove its propriety or expedience.

lawgiver (lâ′giv″ėr), n. [= Icel. loggjafari = Dan. lovgiver.] One who makes or enacts a law or a code of laws; a legislator.

The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come.
Gen. xlix. 10.

Let papal Rome, as the law-giver of the medieval church, have all the credit of her great achievements.
Stubbs, Medieval and Modern Hist., p. 216.

lawgiving (lâ′giv″ing), a. Making or enacting laws; legislating.

Lawgiving heroes, fam'd for taming brutes,
And raising cities with their charming lutes.

Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 582.

2†. The practice or act of cutting off the claws and balls of the feet of an animal, as of the fore feet of a dog, to incapacitate it from following game. See law[1], v. t., 4.

And such lawing shal be done by the assise commonly used: that is to say, that iii. clawes of the forefoote shall bee cut off by the skin.
Rastall, Collect. of Statutes, fol. 185, iv.

The cruel mutilation, the lawing as it was called, of all dogs in the neighbourhood of the royal forests.
E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, v. 108.

3. A reckoning at a public house; a tavern-bill. Also lawin. [Scotch.]

Late at e'en, drinking the wine,
And ere they paid the lawing,
They set a combat them between,
To fight it in the dawing.
The Dowie Dens of Yarrow (Child's Ballads, III. 65).

lawk (lâk), interj. [Also lauk, lawks (cf. law[4]); a trivial euphemism for Lord.] An exclamation expressing wonder or surprise.

Lauk, Mr. Weller, . . . how you do frighten one!
Dickens, Pickwick, xxxix.

Lawk help me, I don't know where to look.
Hood, The Lost Heir.

lawk-a-day (lâk'a-dā), interj. A variant of lack-aday. Miss Hawkins, The Countess and Gertrude, III. 196.

lawks (lâks), interj. A variant of lawk.

"Lawks!" exclaimed Mrs. Partington, "what monsters these master-builders must be!"
The Pioneer (New York), Oct., 1886.

lawland (lâ'land), n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of lowland.

lawless (lâ'les), a. [< ME. laweles, lazelease (= Icel. löglauss = Sw. laglös = Dan. lovlös); < law[1] + -less.] 1. Not subject or not submissive to law; uncontrolled by law, whether natural, human, or divine; licentious; unruly; ungoverned: as, lawless passions; a lawless tyrant or brigand.

And wrong repressed, and establisht right,
Which lawlesse men had formerly fordonne.
Spenser, F. Q., V. i. 2.

To be worse than worst
Of those that lawless and incertain thought Imagine howling! Shak., M. for M., iii. 1. 127.

For him Antæa burn'd with lawless flame,
And strove to tempt him from the paths of fame.
Pope, Iliad, vi. 201.

2. Contrary to law; opposed to the laws of the land or of order; illegal; disorderly: as, a lawless claim; lawless proceedings.

He needs no indirect nor lawless course.
Shak., Rich. III., i. 4. 224.

3. Destitute of law; not conformable to rule or reason; abnormal; anomalous: as, lawless eccentricities; lawless prosody.

Mastering the lawless science of our law.
Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

4. Deprived of legal rights; beyond the pale of the law.—Lawless churches, formerly, in England, churches and chapels exempted from the visitation of the ordinary, the ministers of which usually celebrated marriage without license or banns.—Lawless court. See court.—Lawless man, a man who is deprived of the benefit or protection of the law; an outlaw. Compare lawful man, under lawful.

lawlessly (lâ'les-li), adv. In a lawless manner, or in a manner contrary to law; unlawfully; without regard for law.

lawlessness (lâ'les-nes), n. The condition or quality of being lawless, or of being unrestrained, unauthorized, or uncontrolled by law; want of legality or legitimacy.

But Burton is not so much fanciful as capricious; his motion is not the motion of freedom, but of lawlessness.
De Quincey, Rhetoric.

lawlike†, a. [< law[1] + like[2]. Cf. the older form lawly.] 1. Lawful; allowed by law.

To affirm the giving of any law or lawlike dispense to sin for hardness of heart is a doctrine of extravagance from the sage principles of piety. Milton, Divorce, ii. 7.

2. Regulated as by law; characterized by respect for law and order.

Let not my verse your lawlike minds displease.
Gascoigne, Fruits of War.

law-list (lâ'list), n. An annual publication in England containing matters of information regarding the administration of law and the legal profession, such as lists of the judges, queen's counsel, serjeants at law, benchers, barristers, attorneys, magistrates, law-officers, sheriffs, etc. A similar publication is issued for Scotland.

"Can you give a fellow anything to read in the mean time?" . . . Smallweed suggests the Law List.
Dickens, Bleak House, xx.

law-lord (lâ'lôrd), n. 1. A peer in the British Parliament who holds or has held high judicial office, or has been distinguished in the legal profession. Since 1876 all cases appealed to the House of Lords are brought for decision before a specially constituted court. See lord of appeal in ordinary.

They [the Peers] sit only during half the year. The law-lords, whose advice is required to guide the unlearned majority, are employed daily in administering justice elsewhere. Macaulay, Warren Hastings.

2. A judge of the Court of Session, the supreme court of Scotland.

lawly† (lâ'li), a. [< ME. lawelyche, < AS. lahlīc (= Icel. lögligr = Sw. laglig = Dan. lovlig), lawful, < lagu, law: see law[1] and -ly[1].] Lawful.

lawly† (lâ'li), adv. [< ME. laweliche, lagelice, < AS. lahlīce (= Icel. lögliga), lawfully, < lahlīc, lawful: see lawly, a.] Lawfully.

lawmaker (lâ'mā"kėr), n. One who enacts or ordains laws; a legislator; a lawgiver.

lawman† (lâ'man), n. [< ME. laweman, lagamon (as a man's name, Lazamon, Layamon, the author of the "Brut") (ML. lagamannus, lagemannus), < AS. lahmann, a man acquainted with the law, and whose duty it was to declare it, prop. a Scand. term (= Icel. lögmadhr, OSw. lagman), < lagu, law, + mann, man.] 1. A man authorized to declare the law. Specifically—(a) The chief citizen or first commoner of an ancient Scandinavian community or state, who was the spokesman of the people against the king and court at public assemblies, etc., the guardian of the law, and president both of the legislative body and of the law-courts. (b) The president of the supreme court of Orkney and Shetland while the islands remained under Norse rule.

The Odaller [of Orkney and Shetland] owned no vassalage to king, earl, lawman (chief judge), or hofding, but, with characteristic love of system and deference to lawful authority, he yielded to each in his degree the obedience of a subject. Memorial for Orkney, quoted in Westminster Rev., CXXVIII. 688.

2. One of a body of aristocrats who held magisterial office in towns of Danish origin in early England.

A member, doubtless the foremost member, of the Danish civic Confederation, it [Lincoln] still retained a Danish patriciate of twelve hereditary Lawmen. . . . The Lawmen of Lincoln enjoyed the rights of territorial lords. All twelve were clothed with the judicial powers of sac and soc. . . . And it is to be noticed that three of these great officers were men in holy orders.
E. A. Freeman, Norman Conquest, IV. 208.

lawmonger (lâ'mung"gėr), n. A low practitioner of law; a pettifogger.

Though this chattering lawmonger be bold to call it wicked. Milton, Colasterion.

lawmpast†, n. An obsolete spelling of lampas[1]. Fairholt.

lawn[1] (lân), n. [A corruption of lawnd[1], laund[1]: see laund[1].] 1. An open space in a forest or between or among woods; a glade.

Groves whose rich trees wept odorous gums and balm; . . . Betwixt them lawns, or level downs. Milton, P. L., iv. 252.

Brushing with hasty steps the dews away,
To meet the sun upon the upland lawn.
Gray, Elegy.

Those long, rank, dark wood-walks drench'd in dew,
Leading from lawn to lawn. Tennyson, Fair Women.

2. An open space of ground of some size, covered with grass, and kept smoothly mown, as near a dwelling or in a pleasure-ground.

Four courts I made, East, West, and South and North.
In each a squared lawn. Tennyson, Palace of Art.

lawn[1] (lân), v. t. [< lawn[1], n.] To make into lawn; lay down in grass as a lawn. [Rare.]

Give me taste to improve an old family seat
By lawning an hundred good acres of wheat.
Anstey, New Bath Guide, Conclusion.

lawn[2] (lân), n. and a. [Early mod. E. also lawne, laune, < ME. lawnde, launde; origin uncertain; by some regarded as a peculiar use of lawn[1], either "because from its fineness it was bleached on a lawn or smooth grassy sward" (Imp. Dict.) (whereas the word existed in the form laund, lawnd, at a time when the other word lawn, earlier laund, lawnd, had not the sense of 'a bleaching-lawn'), or because, as "a transparent covering," it might be derived from the sense of "a vista through trees" (Wedgwood). The probable source is that pointed out by Skeat, namely, F. Laon (formerly also Lan), a town near Rheims. Lawn was formerly also called "cloth of Rheims," and Rheims is not far from Cambray and Tournay, which have given cambric and dornick respectively (Skeat). For the form, cf. fawn, < F. faon.] I. n. 1. Fine linen cambric, used for various purposes: also applied in the trade to various sheer muslins. Lawn is notably used for the sleeves and other parts of the dress of bishops of the Anglican Church. The word is hence much used in allusion to bishops, like ermine in allusion to judges.

In that chaunber ther was an hanged bedde,
Of sylk and gold full curyously wrought,
And ther vppon a shete of launde was spredde,
As clenly dressed as it cowde be thought.
Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 73.

The next to it in goodnesse is the line called Byssus, the fine lawne or tiffanie whereof our wives and dames at home set so much store by for to trim and deck themselves.
Holland, tr. of Pliny, xix. 1.

They threw off their doublets both,
And stood up in their sarks of lawn.
Duel of Wharton and Stuart (Child's Ballads, VIII. 263).

An awful period for those who ventured to maintain liberal opinions; and who were too honest to sell them for the ermine of the judge or the lawn of the prelate.
Sydney Smith, in Lady Holland, ii.

2. In ceram., a fine sieve, generally of silk, through which slip for glazing is passed to bring it to uniform fineness and fluidity.—Bishop's lawn, cobweb lawn, cypress lawn†, etc. See the qualifying words.

II. a. Made or consisting of lawn.—Lawn sleeves, sleeves of lawn; the sleeves of an Anglican bishop. See bishop-sleeve.

Suppose the Church, your present mistress, dressed in lawn sleeves, on one hand, and Miss Sophia, with no lawn about her, on the other, which would you be for?
Goldsmith, Vicar, vii.

For you, right rev'rend Osnaburg,
Nane sets the lawn-sleeves sweeter.
Burns, A Dream.

My lords of the lawn-sleeves have lost half their honours now. Thackeray, Virginians, lviii.

lawnd1†, n. An earlier form of laund[1].

lawnd2†, n. An earlier form of lawn[2].

lawn-mower (lân'mō"ėr), n. One who or that which mows a lawn; specifically, a machine, either pushed over the ground by hand or drawn by a horse, according to its size, for cutting the grass on a lawn. The lawn-mower consists essentially of a double-edged spiral knife, or a series of spiral knives, set in the periphery of a cylinder, which is caused by gearing to rotate in contact with the edge of a stationary rectilinear knife placed tangentially to the cylinder at the height from the ground at which the grass is to be cut. The knives thus clip off the grass upon the principle of scissors.

lawn-sprinkler (lân'springk"lėr), n. A contrivance for irrigating a lawn or garden gently and evenly. A common form consists of a vertical pipe supported on a stand, and having an attachment for a hose at the lower and a swivel collar at the upper end. From the swivel collar project one or more short branches with small perforations, and all turned laterally in the same direction with reference to the center. When the water is turned on, its escape from these holes causes the swivel collar to revolve rapidly, and the water is by centrifugal force spread in fine drops over a circle of moderate diameter.

lawn-tennis (lân'ten'is), n. A game played with a ball and rackets on a lawn or other smooth surface by two, three, or four persons. A space, 78 by 27 feet if two play, 78 by 36 if three or four play (called a court), is laid off, and is divided lengthwise into two equal parts by the line L F, and crosswise by a net, C I, 3 feet high in the middle, and 3 feet 6 inches at the ends C and I; service-lines B J and D H are also drawn on each side 21 feet from the net. A player standing on the base-line L K must serve (that is, knock) the ball with his racket over the net into that part of the court lettered CNOD, and his opponent must return the ball on the first bound into any part of the court on the side of the net opposite to him; the original player or his partner must return the ball again, striking it on the fly or the first bound; and thus the ball is driven back and forth over the net until one side fails to return it or knocks it out of the opponent's court. Failure to serve the ball (known as a fault), on two trials, into the proper part of the court, or failure to return a ball at any time during play, counts 15 for the opposing side, a second such failure makes the opposing score 30, a third 40, and a fourth game. Should both sides, however, attain a score of 40, such a situation in the game being known as deuce, one side to win must secure two points in succession; or, if one side has an advantage or vantage—that is, the first point gained after deuce—the other side must make three points in succession in order to win.

Lawn-tennis is a modern adaptation of the first principle of tennis, in the simplest form, to a ball-game played on grass with rackets. Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 181.

lawny1† (lâ'ni), a. [< lawn[1] + -y[1].] Like a lawn; level, and covered with smooth turf.

Thro' forrests, mountains, or the lawny ground
If 't happ you see a maid.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, ii. 1.

lawny2 (lâ'ni), a. [< lawn[2] + -y[1].] Made of or resembling the fabric called lawn.

It was as angry with her lawny veil,
That from his sight it enviously should hide her.
Drayton, Moses, i.

That undefiour'd and unblemishable simplicity of the Gospel—not she herself, for that would never be, but a false-whited, a lawny resemblance of her.
Milton, Church-Government, ii. 3.

law-officer (lâ′of″i-sėr), n. An officer of the law; one vested with legal authority in respect to the administration of justice.

law-piece (lâ′pēs), n. In fishery, an addition to the leader of a pound. [Local, U. S.]

Some fishermen had an excess of 25 feet to the end of the leader, which addition was known as the law-piece, and, when it was brailed up, it left the leader as complete and effectual for guiding the fish into the pound as before.
Conn. Rep., 1871, p. 30.

law-puddering† (lâ′pud″ėr-ing), n. Meddling or "pottering" in the law. [Rare.]

Declaring his capacity nothing refined since his law-puddering, but still the same it was in the pantry and at the dresser. Milton, Colasterion.

lawson-eve†, n. An obsolete form of Low Sunday eve. See low[2]. Halliwell.

Lawsonia (lâ-sō′ni-ą), n. [NL. (Linnæus), named after John Lawson, M. D., author of "A New Voyage to Carolina" (1709).] A genus of choripetalous shrubs, consisting of a single species, L. inermis, the celebrated henna-plant of the East. See henna. The genus belongs to the family Lythraceæ, the loosestrife family, and to the tribe Nesæeæ, being closely related to the crape-myrtle. (See Lagerstræmia.) It has a 4-parted calyx, 4 petals, 8 stamens, a globose 4-celled capsule bursting irregularly, opposite, short-petioled, ovate-lanceolate, entire leaves, and white flowers crowded in fascicles or short axillary corymbs. The plant is probably indigenous to northern Africa, Arabia, and the East Indies, but is cultivated and naturalized throughout the tropics. In England it is often called Egyptian privet, and in the West Indies it goes by the name of Jamaica mignonette.

Lawson's cypress, n. See cypress, 1 (b).

law-stationer (lâ′stā″shọn-ėr), n. In England, one who takes in drafts or writings to be either fair copied or engrossed for lawyers, and who sometimes keeps on sale the articles, as parchment, brief-paper, etc., required by lawyers. In the latter sense the word is in use in the United States.

lawsuit (lâ′sūt), n. A suit at law or in equity; an action or a proceeding in a civil court; a process in law instituted by one party to compel another to do him justice.

lay[1] (lā), v.; pret. and pp. laid (formerly also ★layed), ppr. laying. [< ME. leyen, leien, leggen (pret. leide, leyde, legde, pp. leid, leyd, i-leid, i-leyd, etc.), < AS. lecgan (pret. legde, rarely contr. lēde, pp. ge-leged, rarely contr. ge-lēd) (= OS. leggian = OFries. lega, leia, ledsa, lidsia = D. MLG. leggen = OHG. leggan, lekkan, legen, MHG. G. legen = Icel. leggja = Dan. lægge = Sw. lägga = Goth. lagjan), lay, cause to lie, a causal verb, < licgan (pret. læg), lie: see lie[1]. Lay is thus the causal verb of lie (pret. lay). The two verbs, entirely distinct in AS., began to be confused in ME., and the admission of intrans. uses of the orig. trans. lay, the general freedom of change from intrans. to trans. uses of verbs, and the instability of E. diphthongs containing, as in lay and lie, an absorbed guttural, have made the distinction difficult to keep. Uneducated speakers very commonly, and in certain uses even educated speakers, use lay, v. and n., for lie; but rarely lie for lay.] I. trans. 1. To cause to lie or rest; put or place in a position or situation, or as a deposit or a burden; deposit; place; impose: as, to lay a thing down; to lay one's hands on a thing; to lay a submarine cable; to lay an embargo on something; to lay a tax on land.

lb. An abbreviation of Latin libra, pound, used as a symbol for pound in weight. Sometimes written ℔.

l. c. An abbreviation—(a) in printing, of lower case (that is, small letters, as opposed to capitals); (b) of the Latin loco citato, in the place cited: used to avoid repetition of a citation or reference already given.

le[1] (le). [F. le, OF. le, lo = Sp. Pg. lo = It. lo, m., OF. F. Sp. Pg. It. la, f., def. art.; cf. OF. F. il, he, = Sp. Pg. el = It. il, def. art.; < L. ille (acc. illum, neut. illud), OL. olle, ollus, he, that, used in LL. ML., and hence in Rom., as the def. art.] The French definite article masculine (including the old neuter), much used in Middle English in names of French type, as Johan le Long, William le Bon, etc. (many of which survive in modern English), as well as in modern French names. It occurs contracted and unrecognized in lingot and other words.

In September 1386 the walls of the friary [of the Augustine or Hermit friars, Warrington, Cheshire, England] witnessed a singular scene, for "Messieurs Johan le Botiller, baroun de Werynton, Nichol le Vernoun, . . . sat three days to examine witnesses in the friary church."
Quoted in Baines's Hist. Lancashire, II. 224.

le[2] (lē), n. See li[2].

-le[1]. [Formerly also and in some instances still -el; < ME. -le, -el, etc.; partly < AS. -ol, -ul, or -el, partly < OF. -el (< L. -ellus, etc.) or -le (< L. -ilis, etc.), or -al, -el (< L. -alis), or other forms.] A suffix or termination of very diverse origin, and now usually without obvious significance, occurring in adjectives or nouns of native English origin, as in fickle, mickle, brickle, brittle, etc., cockle, prickle, knuckle, etc., shackle, etc., or of other origin, as in battle[1], battle[2], bottle[2], buckle[2], mettle, etc. See the etymology of such words.

-le[2]. [< ME. -le, -el, with inf. suffix -len, -elen = D. -elen = G. -eln; ult. a var. of -er[4], a freq. suffix. Cf. -le[1].] A suffix of frequentative, or originally frequentative, verbs, as babble, gabble, cackle, crackle, humble[1], mumble, ramble, scramble, scribble, etc. It is equivalent to -er[4] as in gibber, jabber, etc. It is more or less confused with similar suffixes of various origin, as in tremble, trouble, hamble[1], etc.

lea[1] (lē), n. [Formerly also lee, dial. lay, ley (in comp. in local names, -leigh, -ley, -ly); < ME. ley, lay, leye, leyze, < AS. lēah (gen. lēas, dat. lēa), m., lēah (gen. dat. lēage), f., untilled land, a lea, meadow, pasture, = MLG. lo, loch, loge, lage, loye, LG. loge = Flem. loo (as in Waterloo) = OHG. lōh, MHG. lōch, G. dial. loh, a low plain, a morass, = Lith. laukas, an open field, = L. lucus, a grove, wood (orig., according to etym., a glade, a 'clearing'), < lucere, be light, lux, light: see lucent and light[1]. Thus lucus, though said to be so called "a non lucendo," is, regarded as a 'clearing,' really lucus a lucendo. See lucus a non lucendo.] 1. Open, untilled land, usually in grass, or pasture-land; a meadow or grassy plain; a stretch of level fields or commons.

A lady gaye,
Came ridand ouer a longe lee.
Thomas of Erseldoune (Child's Ballads, I. 98).

Two children in two neighbour villages
Playing mad pranks along the heathy leas.
Tennyson, Circumstance.

Hence—2. Any field; any level geographical surface.

And bad hym holde hym at home and eryen his leyes,
And alle that halpe hym to erie to sette or to sowe,
Or any other myster. Piers Plowman (B), vii. 5.

lea[2] (lē, lā), a. and n. [Also lee, ley, lay. Prop. spelled lay or ley, < ME. ley, leye, < AS. lǣge* (in comp. lǣghrycg), lit. Compare lealand, layland. [In this use chiefly prov. Eng.]

Mi londis of vertues liggen al lay.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 70.

The land it may lie lee.
Death of Parcy Reed (Child's Ballads, VI. 141).

II. n. Fallow land; lealand.

lea[3]† (lē), n. [< ME. ley, < Icel. lē = Sw. lie = Dan. lee, a scythe.] A scythe. Catholicon Anglicum, p. 211.

lea[4] (lē), n. [A var. of lay[1].] 1. Same as lay[1], 8. E. H. Knight.—2. One of the sets of alternating threads into which the yarns of a loom are divided by the harness system so as to form the shed.

leach[1]†, n. and v. See leech[1].

leach[2] (lēch), v. t. [Also leech, leich (and latch): ★see letch[1], latch[2].] 1. To wash or drain by percolation of water; treat by downward drainage: as, to make lye by leaching ashes (the most familiar use of the word); the rains leach a gravelly soil.—2. To remove by percolation; drain away: as, to leach the alkali from wood-★ashes.

leach[2] (lēch), n. [< leach[2], v.] 1. A separation of lye, or alkali in solution, as from wood-ashes, by percolation of water.—2. The material used for leaching, as wood-ashes.—3. A deep tub with a spigot inserted in the bottom, used in making potash. It holds from 6 to 8 bushels of wood-ashes.

leach[3], n. See leech[3].

leach[4]† (lēch), n. [< ME. leche, < OF. lesche, F. lèche, a slice, shive.] A dish, of various kinds, served up in slices. It was sometimes a jelly flavored with spices.

Leach, . . . a kind of Jelly made of Cream, Isinglas, Sugar, Almonds, &c. Randle Holme.

leach[4]†, v. t. [< ME. lechen, leschen, slice; from the noun.] To cut into slices; slice.

Seyne bowes of wylde bores, with the braune lechyde.

leach[5] (lēch), n. Same as latch[3].

leach[6] (lēch), n. Same as leash.

leach-craft†, n. See leech-craft.

leacher[1]†, n. See leecher.

leacher[2] (lē′chėr), n. A leach-tub or leaching-vat.

leacher[3]†, leacherous†, etc. Obsolete spellings of lecher, etc.

leaching-vat (lē′ching-vat), n. A leach-tub.

leach-line, n. See leech-line.

leach-trough (lēch′trôf), n. See the quotation.

At the salt works in Staffordshire, they take the corned salt from the rest of the brine with a loot or lute, and put it into barrows, the which being set in the leach-troughs, the salt drains itself dry, which draining they call leach-brine, and preserve it to be boiled again as the best and strongest brine. Kennett, MS. Lansd. 1033. (Halliwell.) leach-tub (lēch′tub), n. A wooden vessel in which ashes are leached. It has the form of an inverted truncated cone, with a perforated false bottom which is covered with straw. In the true bottom is a tap for the removal of the liquor, which is received in a tank below. Also called leaching-vat.

leachy (lē′chi), a. [< leach[2] + -y[1].] Liable to be leached; allowing water to percolate through, ★as gravelly or sandy soil. Also letchy.

lead[1] (lēd), v.; pret. and pp. led, ppr. leading. [< ME. leden (pret. ledde, ladde), < AS. lǣdan (pret. lǣdde, pp. lǣded, lǣd) (= OS. lēdjan = OFries. leda = D. leiden = MLG. leiden, lēden = OHG. leitan, MHG. And zee schulle undirstonde that oure Lord Jesu, in that Nyghte that he was taken, he was ylad in to a Gardyn; and there he was first examyned righte scharply.
Mandeville, Travels, p. 13.

Moses . . . led the flock to the backside of the desert.
Ex. iii. 1.

2. To be at the head of; direct or control the movements or actions of; command: as, to lead an army or an expedition; to lead a mutiny.

The kynge Arthur hath well be-sette the lordship that he hath yow yoven to lede and gouerne his peple.
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), iii. 394.

Assemble thou
Of all those myriads which we lead the chief.
Milton, P. L., v. 684.

Specifically, in music: (a) To conduct or direct, as a band, orchestra, or chorus. (b) To act as a principal performer in, as an orchestra or chorus: said of the principal first violin, of the principal soprano, etc.

3. To go before or in advance of; take the lead of or in; go or be first in: as, the gray horse leads them all; he leads his class in mathematics; to lead the dance.

A-queynte the weel with Prudence,
He ledith alle vertues out & inne.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 60.

For her I made the Song: the Dance with her I lead.
Prior, Solomon, ii.

And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.
Leigh Hunt, Abou Ben Adhem.

We sit in solemn rows on each side of the hall, and are apparently waiting for some one to lead us in prayer.
C. W. Stoddard, Mashallah, xviii.

4. To cause to go or act; draw on; induce; influence: as, to lead one astray; this leads me to refuse.

The king is not himself, but basely led
By flatterers. Shak., Rich. II., ii. 1. 241.

All before him was anxiety, uncertainty. He had cut himself adrift; he was on the great stream. Whither would it lead him? Kingsley, Hypatia, I. 195.

5. To conduct in a way or course; draw or guide in a mode of acting or thinking: as, to lead a stream of water through a field for irrigation; to lead one's thoughts into new channels.

6. To draw out; live through; pass: said of manner of life: as, to lead an idle life.

"Ffeire suster," quod she, "as longe as ye caste yow to lede soche lyf, ye ought not to come in this place."
Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 9.

That we may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. 1 Tim. ii. 2.

7. To draw or drag into; cause to proceed in: as, he led his pursuers a hard chase.

You remember the . . . life he led his wife and daughter.
Dickens.

8. To act as a guide in; show by going before.

And the Lord went before them by day in a pillar of cloud, to lead them the way. Ex. xiii. 21.

He tried each art, reproved each dull delay,
Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.
Goldsmith, Des. Vil., l. 170.

9†. To drive, as horses.

The Sonnes sone, the rede,
That highte Phetoun, wolde lede
Algate his fader carte and gye.
Chaucer, House of Fame, l. 942.

10. To transport or carry, as in a cart or other conveyance. [Obsolete or prov. Eng. or Scotch.]

With him ther was a Ploughman, was his brother,
That hadde i-lad of dong ful many a fother.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 530.

The hard frost . . . kept back the too early growth of autumn-sown wheat, and gave . . . [the farmers] the opportunity of leading manure.
Mrs. Gaskell, Sylvia's Lovers, xvi.

11. In card-playing, to commence a round or trick with: as, to lead a heart or a trump.—To lead apes in hell. See ape.—To lead astray, to draw into a wrong way or into error; seduce from truth or rectitude.—To lead by the nose, to cause to follow or comply submissively, as a bear is led by a ring in the nose.

Though authority be a stubborn bear, yet he is oft led by the nose with gold. Shak., W. T., iv. 4. 832.

To lead captive, to draw or carry into captivity.—To lead on, to persuade to advance; induce; draw on.—To lead one a dance, to lead the dance. See dance.

II. intrans. 1. To go before as a guide; act as a guide; show the way by going along with or in advance; take the lead.

I will lead on softly. Gen. xxxiii. 14.

Lead, monster; we'll follow. Shak., Tempest, iii. 2, 159.

2. To be in advance; be first; have precedence or power of direction: as, to lead in a race or in battle. Specifically, in music: (a) To take the principal part; conduct, as in an orchestra or a chorus. (b) To enunciate the subject or theme of a thematic composition: said of one voice-part which begins alone: usually, in this sense, with off.

3. To serve for direction or guidance; have a direction or tendency; tend: as, this road leads to the river; gaming leads to other vices.

Wide is the gate, and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction. Mat. vii. 13.

The ascent of steps
That to the decorated pillar lead.
Wordsworth, Excursion, vi.

4. In card-playing, to play the first card of a round or trick.—5. To be led; be guided, conducted, or turned in a given way.

As he [the king] was leading to the place of execution, one of his people wept. Penn, No Cross, No Crown, ii.

Weir men say of fish that they lead best when passing rapidly towards some distant point; and worst when they are moving slowly or uncertainly. Mass. Rep., 1872, p. 28.

Before being entered the dogs must be taught to lead quietly. Dogs of Great Britain and America, p. 219.

To lead fair (naut.), said of running rigging when it is clear of the other ropes.—To lead in prayer, to offer prayer in an assembly, as a prayer-meeting: used with reference to leading the thoughts of others into a particular devotional channel.—To lead off, to lead the way or take the initiative in the doing of something.—To lead up to, to bring about or introduce by degrees or in a gradual way: as, these events led up to the establishment of a republic; he led up to his favorite topic.

lead[1] (lēd), n. [= OFries. lede, lade = MD. leyde = MLG. leide, lēde = OHG. leita, leitī, MHG. leite, G. leite, lead; from the verb.] 1. The position of a guide or leader; guidance; direction; instruction; hence, the condition of being first or foremost; precedence: as, to be in the lead; to take the lead of a party; to have a clear lead in a game; to give one a lead in hunting.

I lost the run, and had to see Harriet Tristram go away with the best lead anyone has had to a fast thing.
Trollope, Orley Farm.

The lawyers were, of course, in the lead, as the profession always is in all matters of public interest in our land.
Tourgée, A Fool's Errand, p. 217.

2†. A following.

Take fyve of the best knyghtes
That be in your lede.
Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, v. 108).

3. That which leads or guides; that which is followed, as an example, a clue, or a passageway: as, to follow the lead of a speculator; to find a lead out of a difficulty. Specifically—(a) A passageway; a channel; an open passage through ice.

During the first watch I went up into the crow's nest, to have a look at the leads of open water, and discovered the appearance of one to the southward.
R. M'Cormick, Arc. and Antarc. Voyages, I. 148.

(b) In mining, a lode. See lode[1], n. [Western U. S.]

4. The right of playing the first card in a round or trick; the suit or card so played.

All you have got to mind is to return your partner's lead.
Whyte Melville, Good for Nothing.

5. The course of a running rope from end to end: as, a clear lead.—6. In engin., the average distance required to be traveled to remove the earth of an excavation to form an embankment. It is equivalent to the removal of the whole quantity of the material from the center of gravity of the excavation to the center of gravity of the embankment.

7. In elect.: (a) The angle between the plane through the lines of contact of the brushes or collectors of a dynamo or electric motor with the commutator and the transverse plane bisecting the magnetic field. (b) A conductor conveying electricity from the source to the place where it is to be used.—8. In a steam-engine, an arrangement of the valve or valves and the ports of a cylinder by which the steam is admitted in front of the piston or allowed to escape from behind it a little before the end of the stroke. On the steam-side or inlet-ports it is also called outside lead; on that of the exhaust-ports it is called the inside lead or exhaust-lead.

9. In music: (a) The enunciation by one voice-part of the subject or theme of a thematic composition before the entrance of the other parts. (b) A cue or short passage in one voice-part on which the entrance of others depends.—Lead of the crank, in a steam-engine, the excess above 90° in the angle made by the plane of one crank with the plane of another on the same shaft. This setting secures greater smoothness of motion by moderating the retardation of the piston at the end of the stroke.

lead[2] (led), n. and a. [< ME. leed, < AS. leád, lead, = OFries. lad = D. lood, lead, = MLG. lōt, lead, a weight, lode, a plummet, = MHG. lōt, G. loth = Sw. Dan. lod, a plummet, a lead, ball, bullet, a weight. The word occurs disguised in pilot, q. v. Another Teut. word for 'lead,' the metal, is OHG. blīo, MHG. blī, G. blei, MLG. bli, blig = Icel. blý = Sw. Dan. bly; the L. is plumbum (see plumb).] I. n. 1. Chemical symbol, Pb; atomic weight, 207.10. One of the useful metals, remarkable for its softness and heaviness. It belongs to the class of white metals, but has a decided bluish-gray tint, expressed by the common term "lead-gray." The freshly cut surface is lustrous, but it soon becomes dull from the formation of a film of oxid. Lead is the softest metal in general use; it can be scratched by the finger-nail, and is easily cut with a knife. It is very malleable, and can be rolled into thin sheets; but it cannot be drawn into fine wire. Lead rarely occurs in the native form; as a general rule, and possibly in every instance, the particles of the metal thus found are associated with some ore of lead, or occur in such a manner as to indicate that they are of secondary origin. The most important localities of native lead are in Sweden, near Pajsberg, where this metal occurs in small filiform masses and scaly grains, associated with magnetite in dolomite, and also near Nordmark, where pieces several ounces in weight have been obtained. Native lead has also recently been found crystallized in various forms belonging to the isometric system. Its specific gravity is about 11.4. It fuses at about 620° F.; when heated before the blowpipe on charcoal, it is volatilized, leaving a yellow incrustation. The ores of lead are numerous and widely distributed, occurring in many countries in very considerable quantity. The most important of these ores is the sulphuret (galena), which contains 86½ per cent. of the metal. This ore is found in greater or less quantity in a very large number of metalliferous veins, especially such as produce gold and silver. Galena almost always contains at least a trace of silver, and in most regions the quantity of the precious metal is sufficient to make its separation profitable. (See Pattinson process and Parkes process, under process.) The carbonate of lead (cerusite) is also an important ore of this metal, and so is the sulphate (anglesite), but in less degree. These ores also usually contain silver in paying quantity, and the value of the precious metal is frequently greater than that of the lead itself. One of the chief uses of lead is for service-pipes in the supply of houses with water, a purpose for which the ductility and flexibility of this metal admirably adapt it. A serious drawback, however, is its liability to oxidation and the poisonous nature of the resulting combination, and to overcome this tendency lead pipes are often lined with tin. Another important use of lead is as the base of oil-painting, for which purpose it is used in the form of the carbonate. (See white lead, below.) Lead is also much used in the form of shot and bullets. The most important alloy of which lead forms a part is pewter.

2. A plummet or mass of lead attached to a graduated line, used in sounding at sea. It is usually in the shape of the frustum of a cone or pyramid. For depths of 20 fathoms or under, it has a weight of from 5 to 9 pounds, and is called a hand-lead. For depths from 20 to 60 fathoms, the lead weighs from 20 to 60 pounds, and is called a coasting-lead. For depths from 60 to 200 fathoms, a deep-sea lead is used, weighing from 75 to 120 pounds. A special apparatus, called a deep-sea sounding-machine, is used for depths above 200 fathoms. See deep-sea sounding-machine, under deep-sea.

3. In printing, a thin strip of type-metal (sometimes of brass), used to increase the space between lines of composed types. Leads are usually cast to fractional parts of the body pica. The thickness most used is six-to-pica, one thirty-sixth of an inch, but there are many sizes both above and below this. To make matter still more conspicuous, double leads (two leads together) are often used, and sometimes treble leads.

There is a newspaper in another city which . . . avoids double leads, capitals, pictures, and all forms of typographical hysteria. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 819.

4. A small stick of black-lead or plumbago used in pencils.—5. pl. Sheets or plates of lead used for covering roofs: sometimes used as a singular for a flat roof covered with lead.

He looketh down on his brethren as if he stood on the top of a leads, and not on the same ground they do.
Bp. Andrewes, Sermons, V. 13.

The tempest crackles on the leads.
Tennyson, Sir Galahad.

"On to the leads; will you come and see the view from thence?" I followed still, up a very narrow staircase to the attics, and thence by a ladder and through a trap-door to the roof of the hall. Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, xi.

6†. A pipe of lead; a leader.

And let me (good Lord) be like the Lead
Which to som Citie from som Conduit-head Brings holsom water; yet (self-wanting sense)
It selfe receiues no drop of comfort thence.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., Eden.

7. In stained-glass work, etc., one of the cames or ribbons of lead, grooved on both sides, which serve to retain the glass by the edges.—8. In knitting, a tin or lead socket in which a needle is fixed before being fitted to the frame.—Black lead. See black-lead.—Blue lead. (a) A miners' name for galena. (b) In the manufacture of white lead, lead which has not become perfectly converted into the carbonate, and therefore retains more or less of its blue color.—Chocolate lead. See chocolate.—Corneous lead. Same as phosgenite.—Drift-lead, a heavy lead hung overboard when a ship is lying at anchor, to show if she drifts or drags.—Glaziers' turned lead. Same as came[3], 2.—Green lead ore. See pyromorphite.—Lead-float file. See file[1].—Lead-shaving machine, a series of rotary knives so combined as to reduce lead to shavings for the manufacture of white lead.—Leads of Venice, places of confinement situated immediately under the leads (roof) of the ducal palace in Venice, memorable for the political prisoners confined there in the time of the Venetian republic.—Milled lead. Same as sheet-lead (which see, below).—Mock lead. Same as blende.—Red lead, a pigment formed by the exposure of litharge to the action of air at a temperature of 560°, under which conditions it absorbs oxygen. It is used for a variety of purposes. When mixed with mastic and linseed-oil, it is used as a cement for the flanges of steam-pipes, but it enters the market chiefly as a pigment, as, when mixed with either water or linseed-oil, it covers extremely well.—Red lead ore. Same as crocoite.—Sheet-lead, a thin plate of lead made by passing a flat ingot repeatedly through a rolling-mill until the requisite thinness has been attained. Called in England milled lead.—Sugar of lead, or lead acetate, a crystalline salt prepared by dissolving lead or litharge in vinegar or pyroligneous acid. It has a sweetish taste, and in large doses is a violent irritant poison. It is used in medicine both internally and externally, and extensively in the arts.—To arm a lead. See arm[2].—To heave or cast the lead, to cast the deep-sea lead or hand-lead for the purpose of taking soundings.

I sall caste leede and loke the space,
Howe depe the watir is ilke a dele.
York Plays, p. 51.

White lead, a mixture of the carbonate and the hydrated oxid of lead in somewhat varying proportions, approximating to 75 per cent. of the former and 25 per cent. of the latter. It is prepared as follows: Metallic lead is cast into perforated disks 7 inches in diameter and ¼ inch thick, technically called buckles. These are packed into earthenware pots 15 inches high, and to each pot is added a small amount of acetic acid. The pots are then piled into bins 40 feet square, and the whole covered with spent tan-bark and left alone for nearly three months. During this time the temperature rises, steam is given off, and a rather complex chemical decomposition takes place, by which the metallic-lead buckles become converted into the white carbonate. But the quantity of lead converted into white lead seldom amounts to more than 65 per cent. The bins are unloaded and the contents of the pots thrown into a revolving screen, which separates the white lead from the unconverted metallic lead, this latter being remelted and put through the process again. The white lead is ground to a fine powder, and then made into a paste with 10 per cent. of linseed-oil, forming the paint known as white lead in oil. This method of converting metallic lead into white lead is known as the "Dutch process." Other methods tending toward greater quickness and economy have also been used.—Yellow lead ore. See wulfenite.

II. a. Made or composed of lead; consisting more or less of lead.—Lead flat, a level roof covered with sheet-lead resting on boarding and joists. E. H. Knight.—Lead lights, a form of casement-window having small panes set in leaden cames, which are attached to cross-bars called saddle-bars. E. H. Knight.
=Syn. See leaden.

lead[2] (led), v. t. [< ME. leden, leeden (= D. looden = MLG. loden = G. lothen = Dan. lodde = Sw. loda, sound with the lead; from the noun.] 1. To cover with lead; fasten or fit with lead; join by means of lead: as, to lead a roof; to lead stained glass, as in a window.

The Cloysters about it [the palace], leaded above, and paved with stone, the roof supported with columnes of marble. Sandys, Travailes, p. 25.

2. In printing, to insert leads between the lines of, as type.—3. In ceram., to give metallic gloss to by means of an ore of lead ground fine and strewn over the surface.—4. To smooth and polish (the bore of a rifled gun) by the application of a leaden lap.

When once rifled, the barrel cannot—as in the Henry, Ratchet, and other riflings—be leaded or otherwise regulated, except with the rifling machine.
W. W. Greener, The Gun, p. 146.

To lead out, in printing, to insert leads between the lines of (composed types).—To lead up, in stained-glass work, to join or assemble (the different pieces) by means of lead ribbons or cames.

lead[3]†, n. [Also leed; < ME. leede; perhaps < Gael. luchd, a pot, kettle.] A caldron; a copper kettle.

His heede
That stemede as a forneys of a leede.
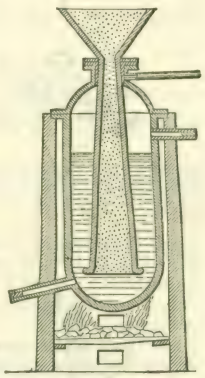
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 202.



Mow haulm to burn,
To serve thy turn,
To bake thy bread,
To burn under lead.
Tusser, Husbandry, August's Abstract.

lead-arming (led'är″ming), n. A lump of tallow, soap, grease, or other similar substance pressed into the lower end of a sounding-lead for the purpose of ascertaining the nature of the bottom from the particles adhering to the greasy substance.

lead-ash (led'ash), n. The slag of lead.

leadback (led'bak), n. The American dunlin, ox-bird, or purre. [Shinnecock Bay, L. I.] lead-bath (led'bȧth), n. A furnace for exposing ores of gold or silver mechanically to the action of melted lead. The powdered ores unite with the lead to form an alloy, and the precious metals are afterward extracted from the alloy by various processes.

Lead-bath.

lead-colic (led'kol″ik), n. See colic.

lead-color (led'kul″ọr), n. A dull bluish-gray color, approximating to the color of lead.

lead-colored (led'kul″-ọrd), a. Having the color of lead; of a dull-grayish color: as, lead-colored clouds.

lead-cutter (led'kut″ėr), n. A machine made to cut to any length the leads used by printers. Many forms are in use, but all have a flat table, an adjustable gage, and a chisel-faced cutter that is brought down by means of a lever.

lead-eater (led'ē″tėr), n. India-rubber. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

leaded (led'ed), a. [< lead[2] + -ed[2].] 1. Separated or spaced by the insertion of thin strips of type-metal between the lines: said of composed types.—2. Fitted or furnished with lead. Especially—(a) Covered with sheet-lead, as a roof. (b) Set in a frame of lead; joined by means of bars or ribbons of lead, as stained-glass work.—Leaded sash, the sash of a stained-glass or other window in which the panes are held by bars or ribbons of lead.

leaden (led'n), a. [< ME. leden, < AS. leáden (= D. looden), of lead, < leád, lead: see lead[2] and -en[2].] 1. Made or consisting of lead: as, a leaden ball; a leaden coffin.

What says this leaden casket? Shak., M. of V., ii. 7. 15.

To me thy leaden Rod resign,
To charm the Centinels
On Mount Citheron.
Congreve, Semele, iii. 1.

2. Like lead in any particular. (a) Inertly heavy: as, the leaden weight of a helpless person. (b) Heavy and slow: as, a leaden pace. (c) Dull; sluggish; without spirit.

If he be leaden, icy-cold, unwilling,
Be thou so too. Shak., Rich. III., iii. 1. 176.

Base, leaden earls that glory in your birth.
Marlowe, Edward II., ii. 2.

(d) Of the color of lead; dull-colored; hence, gloomy: as, a leaden sky.

[Leaden is often compounded with participial adjectives: as, leaden-winged time; a leaden-paced messenger.

This may serve to shew the Difference betwixt the two Nations, the leaden-heel'd Pace of the one, and the quicksilver'd Motions of the other. Howell, Letters, I. iv. 21.

O leaden-hearted men, to be in love with death!
Thomson, Castle of Indolence, ii.]

Leaden bulls. See bull[2].—Syn. Lead, Leaden. Lead as an adjective is not used figuratively; leaden is used both literally and figuratively; as, a lead or leaden image; a leaden sky. A similar distinction exists between wood and wooden, gold and golden, etc.: as, a wood partition; wooden walls; wooden immobility; a gold watch; golden clouds, or hopes, or prospects. The form in -en is generally preferable rhythmically; hence its retention and extension in poetic use.

lead-encephalopathy (led'en-sef-a-lop″a-thi), n. A morbid cerebral condition produced by chronic lead-poisoning.

leaden-gray (led'n-grā), a. and n. Same as ★lead-gray.

leader[1] (lē'dėr), n. [< ME. leder, ledere, < AS. lǣdere (= OFries. ledera, ledere = D. leider = MLG. leider, lēder = OHG. leitari, MHG. leitære, leiter, G. leiter = Dan. leder = Sw. ledare), a leader, < lǣdan, lead: see lead[1].] 1. One who leads, guides, conducts, directs, or controls; a director or conductor; a chief or commander.

They be blind leaders of the blind. Mat. xv. 14.

I have given him for . . . a leader and commander of the people. Isa. lv. 4.

A resolute leader might have brought it [the war] to a close in a month. Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

2. One who is first or most prominent in any relation; one who takes precedence by virtue of superior qualification or influence; a recognized principal or superior: as, leaders of society; a leader of the bar.

Bi waar of richelees, for he wole make diffence,
For he is leder of al synne.
Hymns to Virgin, etc. (E. E. T. S.), p. 60.

Queen's Counsel are usually termed Leaders, & they sit in front of the other Barristers, whome they are said to "lead" in any particular case in which both are engaged.
Slater, Guide to Legal Prof., p. 17.

Judges, mayors, . . . leaders in science, clergymen better than famous, . . . were represented in that meeting.
O. W. Holmes, Autocrat, p. 123.

3. In the Meth. Epis. Ch., one who has charge of a "class," which he meets at stated times, and over which he exercises a quasi-pastoral supervision. See class, n., 3 (b).—4. In music: (a) A conductor or director. (b) The principal first-violin player in an orchestra (concert-master), the principal cornettist in a band, or the principal soprano in a chorus. Formerly the leader of an orchestra was also the conductor, but the duties of leading and conducting are now separated in large orchestras.

5. That which leads or conducts; something that guides the course of a thing, or conducts to it. (a) In mining, the more or less well-defined vein-like mass of ore which the miner follows in his work; the indication which the miner follows when working an irregular metalliferous deposit. This is sometimes a mere crack, sometimes a fissure with vein-stone or even with ore, and sometimes a well-defined fissure-vein. The word is used chiefly where there is some complexity in the phenomena, as where the rock on each side of the fissure is more or less mineralized, so that the fissure or leader forms only a part of the metalliferous deposit. (b) A pipe for the conveyance of water from a roof or the upper part of a house to the ground. (c) A row of dots or hyphens which lead the eye of a reader from words or figures at one end of a line to words or figures at the other end. (d) A block or piece of wood in which holes are cut to serve as guides for ropes. (e) A kind of wrapped quick-match to lead fire rapidly from one part of a piece of fireworks to another. (f) A furrow extending from the eye to the skirt of a millstone. (g) In fishing, a piece of silkworm gut or fine cord at the end of the reel-line, several feet long, to which the droppers or bobbers are attached at proper intervals. Also called casting-line. (h) A structure consisting of a fence of laths or brush, or of stakes interwoven with brush or with netting, or formed of stone, for leading fish into a pound, weir, or heart-seine. The fish following the shore meet the leader, and turn and follow it to its termination. Leaders are most frequently used where there is a long extent of shallow water which ebbs off at low tide.

The pounds of some of the Connecticut fishermen have net-leaders of from 700 to 1,300 feet, set on poles 25 or 30 feet long, driven into the sand.
Massachusetts Fisheries Report, 1868, p. 11.

(i) In surveying, the foremost of the two chain-carriers. (j) A ring or gripper used for leading cattle, passed through the septum of the nose.

6. That which precedes; something that has a leading or foremost place, whether in actual position or in importance. Specifically—(a) One of the leading or front horses in a team of four or more, as distinguished from a wheeler, or one placed next the carriage.

St. Foix takes a post-chaise
With, for "wheelers," two bays, and, for "leaders," two greys. Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, II. 20.

(b) The principal wheel in a set of machinery. (c) A principal editorial article in a newspaper; one of the longer articles in a newspaper appearing as its own utterances or expressions of editorial views, whether written by the ostensible editor or by leader-writers or contributors.

Mr. Bryant was the first of our journalists to adopt the English practice of leaders, which has since become the universal habit of our journalism.
D. J. Hill, Bryant, p. 96.

7. A sinew; a tendon: as, the leaders of the fingers or toes. [Technical.]—8. Something offered as a special attraction to customers; a leading "bargain." [Trade cant.]

A new rival may inflict severe loss through overestimating the business field which he enters; through cutting the price of a staple below cost, and making it what is called a leader. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXXIV. 622.

9. In bot., the terminal shoot of an excurrent trunk, commonly forming the apex of a cone-shaped tree, as in the fir and the larch.—Cuckoo's leader, the wryneck.—Follow my leader. See follow.—Syn. 1 and 2. Commander, Head, etc. See chief.

leader[2]† (led'ėr), n. [< ME. ledere, leedare; < lead[2] + -er[1].] A plumber.

leader-boy (lē'dėr-boi), n. A boy who guides bullocks. See fore-looper. [South Africa.]

leaderette (lē-dėr-et'), n. A short leader in a newspaper. [Eng.]

leader-furrow (lē'dėr-fur″ō), n. See furrow.

leader-hook (lē'dėr-hůk), n. A hold-fast hook to support a rain-water leader. Its tang is driven into the wall.

leadership (lē'dėr-ship), n. [< leader[1] + -ship.] The office of a leader; guidance; control.

leader-writer (lē'dėr-rī″tėr), n. A member of the editorial staff of a newspaper who writes leaders or editorial articles.

lead-glance (led'glȧns), n. Lead ore; galena.

lead-glaze (led'glāz), n. A glaze for ceramic ware produced by the use of lead, applied throughout Europe and America to the coarser kinds of pottery for domestic use. Ware covered with this glaze was usually coarse and brittle, and a coating was needed to make it available for holding liquids; but the glaze was injurious in the case of such contents as would partly dissolve it, and hence pottery so coated was largely superseded, especially by salt-glazed ware.

lead-gray (led'grā), a. and n. I. a. Colored like lead.

II. n. A color resembling that of lead. Also leaden-gray.

leadhillite (led'hil-īt), n. [< Leadhills, a locality in Lanarkshire, Scotland, + -ite[2].] A sulphato-carbonate of lead occurring in transparent white to yellow or greenish crystals.

leading[1] (lē'ding), n. [< ME. ledyng; verbal n. of lead[1], v.] 1. The act of conducting or guiding; conduct; leadership; command.

Hir fader, whiche in Romaine
The ledynge of the chiualrie
In gouernance hath vndertake.
Gower, Conf. Amant., vii.

2. Ability to lead; commanding quality or capacity.

The situation of the Whig Party is very critical indeed, and I really think it becomes necessary for your Lordship and all other men of great leading and property in the country to come up to town and to concert the measures to be taken in so critical a moment.
C. J. Fox, Letter, July 1, 1782.

3. A directing influence or guidance; especially, a spiritual indication of the proper course of action in any case: a term used by the Friends or Quakers.

Ann Millet, a young person who began to have leadings at the age of four years, who never cared to play, never laughed, and always waited to be directed before she even washed her hands.
M. C. Lee, A Quaker Girl of Nantucket, p. 8.

★ leading[1] (lē'ding), p. a. [Ppr. of lead[1], v.] 1. Guiding; conducting; preceding; hence, serving as a precedent.

He left his mother a countess by patent, which was a new leading example. Sir H. Wotton.

2. Attracting; drawing: as, a leading article among shopkeepers (that is, something offered as a special inducement to customers, for its attractiveness or its cheapness, or both).—3. Chief; principal; capital; most influential: as, a leading motive in action; a leading man in a party.

The constitutional changes made by Solon were in leading respects towards industrial organization.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Sociol., § 488.

Leading article. Same as leader[1], 6 (c).—Leading axle. See axle.—Leading business (theat.), the acting of principal parts or rôles in plays.—Leading chord, in music, the chord of the dominant: so called because it leads naturally into that of the tonic.—Leading column (milit.), the first column that advances from the right, left, or center of a company, battalion, or army.—Leading file, the first two men who advance from the right, left, or center of a company or a battalion.—Leading guide, the guide to whose movements a column of soldiers must conform in marching.—Leading lights. See light[1].—Leading man, leading lady, the chief performers in a theatrical company; the man and woman who enact the parts of hero and heroine.—Leading marks, objects on shore used for guidance on entering or leaving port.—Leading melody, in music, the melody which controls the construction of a piece at any point. In plain music it is usually the soprano part, but in thematic music it may be any part or all the parts in turn.—Leading motive [German leitmotif], in dramatic music, a principal motive or theme; a theme, usually of but few tones, by which a personage, situation, thought, or emotion is indicated, and which recurs (sometimes in a modified form) whenever the personage, situation, thought, or emotion appears or is suggested. The principle of the leading motive was recognized in the middle of the eighteenth century, but was not elaborately applied until the later works of Richard Wagner, especially in those of the Nibelungen Trilogy, in "Tristan and Isolde," etc.—Leading note, leading tone, in music, the seventh tone of the major scale (and of certain forms of the minor scale), commonly called si (by the tonic-sol-faists te); the subtonic: so called because it lies but one half-step below the tonic or key-note, and (in ascending passages) naturally leads into it. The leading tone is characteristic of the modern as contrasted with the medieval modes, in all but one of which the seventh tone was a whole step below the tonic; hence it is sometimes called the characteristic tone.—Leading principle of inference. See inference.—Leading question. See question.—Leading wind (naut.), a wind abeam or quartering.

leading[2] (led′ing), n. [Verbal n. of lead[2], v.] 1. Lead-work; the leads, as of a house; articles of lead collectively.

lead-pot (led′pot), n. A crucible or pot for melting lead. E. H. Knight.

lead-screw (lēd′skrö), n. In mech., the main screw of a lathe, which gives the longitudinal motion to the slide-rest.

lead-sinkers (lēd′sing″kėrz), n. pl. In a knitting-machine, a series of plates attached to a sinker-bar, by which they are depressed all together in order to form a loop between every two needles. They alternate with the jack-sinkers.

leadsman[1]† (lēdz′man), n. [ME. ledesman; a var. of lodesman, q. v.] One who leads the way.

I wyll be your ledes man,
And lede you the way.
Lytell Geste of Robyn Hode (Child's Ballads, V. 108).

leadsman[2] (ledz′man), n. Naut., a seaman who heaves the lead.

lead-soap (led′sōp), n. An insoluble oleate, palmitate, or stearate of lead, or a mixture of these salts. It is known in pharmacy as lead-plaster.

lead-spar (led′spär), n. Cerusite.

lead-tracery (led′trā″sėr-i), n. The lead sashes or ribbons, collectively, in any combination of glass, as in a window, formed with leaden cames.

lead-tree (led′trē), n. A leguminous tree, Leucæna glauca, related to the acacias. It is native in tropical America, and has been naturalized in Africa and Asia. It is widely cultivated as an ornamental tree in warm climates.

lead-vitriol (led′vit″ri-ol), n. Same as anglesite.

lead-water (led′wȧ″tėr), n. Aqueous solution of subacetate of lead, employed in medicine as an external application. It is sedative and astringent. It is the liquor plumbi subacetatus dilutus of the pharmacopœia.

lead-works (led′wėrks), n. sing. or pl. A place where lead is extracted from the ore.

leadwort (led′wėrt), n. [< lead[2] + wort[1].] 1. An herbaceous plant of southern Europe, Plumbago Europæa.—2. By extension, any plant of the genus Plumbago, family Plumbaginaceæ.—Cape leadwort, P. Capensis, a cultivated species from South Africa, with somewhat climbing, angled stems, and large pale- or lead-blue corollas.—Ceylon or white-flowered leadwort, a shrubby East Indian species, P. Zeylanica.—Leadwort family, the Plumbaginaceæ.

leady† (led′i), a. [Early mod. E. ledy; < lead[2] + -y[1].] Pertaining to or resembling lead in any of its properties.

His ruddy lippes [were] wan, & his eyen ledy and holowe. Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, ii. 12.

leaf (lēf), n.; pl. leaves (lēvz). [< ME. leef, lef (pl. leves), < AS. leáf (pl. leáf) = OS. lōbh = OFries. laf = D. loof = MLG. lōf = OHG. loub, loup, MHG. loup, G. laub = Icel. lauf = Sw. löf = Dan. löv = Goth. laufs, a leaf. Cf. Lith. lāpas = Russ. lepeste, a leaf, Gr. λέπος, λεπίς, a scale (see lepis). For the L. and Gr. words for 'leaf,' see foil[1]. Hence ult. lobby, lodge; in comp. ME. lef-sel.] 1. An expanded, usually green, organ of a plant, of transient duration, produced laterally from a stem or branch, and, with others, arranged upon the stem in a definite and symmetrical order. In the most complete sense, a leaf consists of a blade or lamina, the broad, flat portion; a footstalk, leafstalk, or petiole, the linear portion connecting the blade with the stem; and a pair of appendages, the stipules, at the base of the petiole; but often the petiole, and still more often the stipules, are wanting. In any case, leaf very frequently denotes merely the blade, especially with descriptives: as, a cordate, an ovate, a lanceolate leaf, etc. Leaves are simple or compound, according as they have one or several blades. They are distinguished also by the arrangement of their veins. (See nervation.) Physiologically, the normal function of leaves is assimilation—that is, the transformation of inorganic into organic matter, which takes place only in the green parts of the plant. But leaves may be converted to various other uses—for example, into a, unifoliate leaf of orange (Citrus Aurantium); b, simple leaf of chestnut (Castanea vesca).

Compound Leaves.

c, decompound bipinnate leaf of Gleditsia triacanthos; d, palmately trifoliate leaf of clover (Trifolium pratense); e, ternately decompound leaf of Thalictrum dioicum; f, pari-pinnate leaf of Arachis hypogæa; g, palmately compound leaf of horse-chestnut (Æsculus Hippocastanum); h, pinnately trifoliate leaf of Phaseolus polystachyus.

means for the capture and maceration of insects, as in sundew and Venus's fly-trap, or into organs for climbing, as in the pea-vine; and in many other ways leaves depart from the typical description above given.

Robyn was in mery Scherwode
As lizt as lef on lynde.
Robin Hood and the Monk (Child's Ballads, V. 14).

Languid leaves whereon the autumn blows—
The dead red raiment of the last year's rose.
Swinburne, Two Dreams.

2. Anything resembling a leaf, as in being flat and relatively broad, or in being a flexible or movable attachment or addition to something else. (a) A single thickness of paper in a book or folded sheet; hence, with reference to the words written or printed upon it, the part of a book contained in one of such leaves.

This is a lef of vre bileeue as lettret men vs techeth.
Piers Plowman (A), viii. 162.

Had she loked that other half and the lef torned,
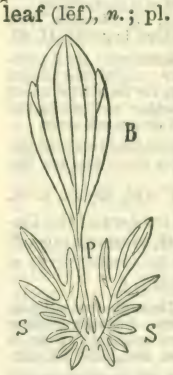
She shulde haue founden fele wordis folwyng therafter.
Piers Plowman (B), iii. 338.



I turn
The leaf to read them.
Shak., Macbeth, i. 3. 152.

(b) A separately movable division of a folding or sliding door, fire-screen, table, hinge, etc.

To Sir Philip Warwick's, to dinner, where abundance of company come in unexpectedly; and here I saw one pretty piece of household stuff, as the company increaseth, to put a larger leaf upon an ovall table. Pepys, Diary, II. 238.

The entrance to the park lay through an old-fashioned gateway in the outer wall, the door of which was formed of two huge oaken leaves, thickly studded with nails.
Scott, Kenilworth, iii.

(c) A very thin sheet of hammered metal; foil: as, gold-leaf. (d) A portion of fat lying in a separate fold or layer; especially, the fat about the kidneys of a pig (compare Leaf of Viola tricolor, showing B, the blade, P, the petiole, and S S, the two stipules.

leaf-lard); hence, in local use, the kidney itself. [Prov. Eng.]

What say you to the leafe or flecke of a brawne new kild, to be of weight eight pound?
John Taylor, Works (1630).

(e) A tooth of a pinion, especially when the pinion is small. (f) In arch., an ornament resembling or representing a leaf of a plant; a foliation. (g) A flap, as of a hat.

Harry let down the leaf of his hat and drew it over his eyes to conceal his emotions.
Brooke, Fool of Quality, II. 129.

(h) In tapestry-weaving, one half the threads of the warp. As a preliminary to working a tapestry these leaves are separated, one being brought nearer the workman and the other left in the background. (i) In zoöl., a leaf-like part or organ. See noseleaf, and compare leaflet, 4.

3†. A distemper in young lambs caused by feeding on leaves. Bailey, 1731.—Adverse, assurgent, compound, concave, connate leaf. See the adjectives.—Cross of four leaves. See cross[1].—Dutch leaf, fleshy leaf, germinate leaves. See the adjectives.—Florence leaf, a leaf-alloy or leaf-metal of a yellow color, used for decorative purposes.—Foliage leaves, those leaves which serve the normal purpose of assimilation.—Latticed leaves, cancellate leaves.—Leaf isinglass. See isinglass.—Lyrate leaf. See lyrate.—Malabar leaves, the leaves of Cinnamomum nitidum and other species mixed together, formerly used in European medicine.—Oblique, obtuse, orbicular, simple, etc., leaf. See the adjectives.—The fall of the leaf. See fall[1].—To take a leaf out of one's book. See book.—To turn over a new leaf, to adopt a different and better line of conduct.

Except such men think themselves wiser than Cicero for teaching of eloquence, they must be content to turn a new leaf. Ascham, The Scholemaster, p. 122.

leaf (lēf), v. i. [< leaf, n. Cf. leave[3], v.] To shoot out leaves; produce foliage: as, the trees leaf in May. Also leave.

The vales shall laugh in flowers, the woods
Grow misty green with leafing buds.
Whittier, The Clear Vision.

leafage (lē′fāj), n. [< leaf + -age.] Leaves collectively; foliage.

Soft grass and wandering leafage have rooted themselves in the rents, but they are not suffered to grow in their own wild and gentle way, for the place is in a sort inhabited. Ruskin.

leaf-bearing (lēf′bâr″ing), a. In zoöl.: (a) Bearing leaves—that is, carrying leaves about in the mouth: as, the leaf-bearing ants. (b) Having leaf-like or foliaceous appendages of the body: ★as, the leaf-bearing worms. See Phyllodocidæ.

leaf-beetle (lēf′bē″tl), n. A beetle of the family Chrysomelidæ, nearly all the members of which are leaf-feeders both as larvæ and as adults. The three-lined leaf-beetle (Lema trilineata) feeds on the leaves of the common potato, and its larva covers its back with excrement. The pupa is formed underground. See cuts under Chrysomela and Lema.

leaf-blade (lēf′blād), n. The blade or lamina ★of a leaf.

leaf-blight (lēf′blīt), n. A disease affecting the leaves of various plants, caused by parasitic fungi. A general term used to indicate a pathological condition of leaves, usually produced by some parasitic fungus or bacterium, which causes the leaves to become brown or spotted.

leaf-bridge (lēf′brij), n. A form of drawbridge in which the rising leaf or leaves swing vertically on hinges. E. H. Knight.

leaf-bud (lēf′bud), n. A bud producing a stem with leaves only, as distinguished from a flower-bud, technically called a gemma. They are normal when produced either at the end of the shoot or in the axils; otherwise they are adventitious. When not ★externally apparent they are called latent buds.

leaf-bug (lēf′bug), n. Any heteropterous insect of either of the families Tingitidæ and Capsidæ: as, the ash-gray leaf-bug, Piesma cinerea.

leaf-butterfly (lēf′but″ėr-flī), n. A butterfly of the genus Kallima.

leaf-carrier (lēf′kar″i-ėr), n. A leaf-carrying ant.

leaf-comb (lēf′kōm), n. See comb[1], 3.

leaf-crumpler (lēf′krum″plėr), n. One of certain pyralid moths of the family Phycitidæ, whose larvæ crumple the leaves of various trees and plants to make cases for themselves. The common apple leaf-crumpler of the United States is Phycis nebulo, also called Mineola indiginella. It appears in ★summer, laying eggs from which the larvæ hatch and become about one third grown when winter sets in. They hibernate in a crumpled silken case attached to twigs or hidden in leaves, and in spring do much damage by devouring the tender young leaves. They feed on the apple, cherry, plum, quince, and peach. They are subject to the attacks of parasitic insects. Riley, 4th Mo. Ent. Rep., p. 38. See second cut under Acrobasis.

leafcup (lēf′kup), n. A plant of the genus Polymnia, belonging to the family Asteraceæ. The plants are coarse herbs, with the outer scales of the ★involucre large and leaf-like, whence the name.

leaf-cutter (lēf′kut″ėr), n. 1. A leaf-cutting bee, as any species of the genus Megachile: so called from their cutting or biting out morsels of leaves to line their nests with. Also called upholsterer.—2. A knife used to cut the leaves of a book: same as paper-cutter. [U. S., rare.]

leafed (lēft), a. [< leaf + -ed[2].] Having leaves: used frequently in composition: as, broad-leafed; thin-leafed, etc.

leafen† (lē′fn), a. [< leaf + -en[2].] Formed in leaves: as, "leafen gold," Hervey, Meditations, I. 96.

leaf-feeder (lēf′fē″dėr), n. An insect or its larva which feeds on leaves.

leaf-finch (lēf′finch), n. The common bullfinch, ★Pyrrhula vulgaris.

leaf-folder (lēf′fōl″dėr), n. In entom., one of various moths whose larvæ fold leaves together, making cases in which to reside. See cut under Desmia.

leaf-footed (lēf′fůt″ed), a. Having leafy or foliaceous feet; phyllopod: specifically applied to the Phyllopoda: as, a leaf-footed crustacean.

leaf-gilding (lēf′gil″ding), n. Gilding by the ★application of gold-leaf. See gilding, 1.

leaf-gold (lēf′gōld), n. Gold-leaf. Jer. Taylor, ★Works (ed. 1835, Sermons), I. 692.

leaf-hopper (lēf′hop″ėr), n. A hemipterous insect of the family Jassidæ. The species are all plant-feeders, some of them doing great damage. Erythroneura vitis lays its eggs in April and May in the veins of young grape-leaves, and by the middle of June swarms in the perfect state on the under side of the leaves. It is found from Massachusetts to Georgia and the Mississippi valley. It is erroneously called by many grape-growers the grape-vine thrips.

Leaf-hopper (Erythroneura vitis): a, with wings extended; b, with wings closed. (Hair-lines show natural sizes.)

leafiness (lē′fi-nes), n. The state of being leafy or full of leaves.

The sidelong view of swelling leafiness. Keats.

leaf-insect (lēf′in″sekt), n. An orthopterous insect of the family Phasmidæ: so called from its mimetic resemblance to the leaf of a plant. Also called walking-leaf.

leaf-lard (lēf′lärd), n. Lard prepared from the flaky fat of the hog.

leaf-legged (lēf′legd), a. Having foliaceous or ★expanded legs, as an insect.

leafless (lēf′les), a. [< leaf + -less.] Without leaves; having lost its leaves: as, a leafless tree.

leaflessness (lēf′les-nes), n. The state of be-★ing leafless.

leaflet (lēf′let), n. [< leaf + -let.] 1. A little leaf; in bot., one of the divisions of a compound leaf; a foliole.—2. A small leaf of printed matter for distribution; a tract.

A generous gift of Liberation leaflets for home use and distribution among the neighbours.
Quarterly Rev., CLXII. 12.

leaf-lichen (lēf′lī″ken), n. A lichen of the genus Parmelia: so called from the foliose appearance.

leaf-louse (lēf′lous), n. An aphid; a plant-louse.

leaf-metal (lēf′met″al), n. Metal in extremely thin leaves; especially, such a metal imitating ★gold in color and luster, used for cheap gilding.

leaf-miner (lēf′mī″nėr), n. The larva of any one of many tineine moths: so called because these caterpillars feed mostly on the parenchyma of leaves, and between the upper and ★lower surfaces.

leaf-mold (lēf′mōld), n. An earthy substance consisting of a disintegrated mass of decayed leaves. It is much used, alone or mixed with earth or other substances, as a soil for some house- and garden-plants.

leaf-mouthed (lēf′moutht), a. Having a foliaceous appendage on the snout, as the bats of the family Phyllostomidæ.

leaf-netting (lēf′net″ing), n. A mode of netting by which some of the loops of a row are made higher and more projecting than others: used especially for borderings to netted fabrics.

leafnose (lēf′nōz), n. A bat of the family Phyllostomidæ.

leaf-nosed (lēf′nōzd), a. Having a foliaceous appendage on the snout; rhinolophine or phyl-★lostomous, as various bats.

leaf-roller (lēf′rō″lėr), n. One of several different moths, as tortricids, whose larvæ roll leaves into cases for themselves. The strawberry Strawberry Leaf-roller (Ancylis fragariæ).

a, larva, natural size; b, head and thoracic joints of same, enlarged; c, moth (cross shows natural size); d, anal shield of larva, enlarged.

leaf-roller, a tortricid, Ancylis fragariæ, common in many parts of the United States and Canada, is injurious to the strawberry. The cotton or rose leaf-roller, Lozotænia gossypiana, or Archips rosaceana, common all over the country, rolls the leaves of cotton, clover, bean, birch, ap-★ple, rose, and many other trees and plants.

leaf-rust (lēf′rust), n. A disease causing the appearance of rusty spots on leaves, produced by parasitic fungi of the family Uredineæ.

leaf-shaped (lēf′shāpt), a. Shaped like a leaf: specifically applied in archæology to certain swords of the bronze period.

leaf-sight (lēf′sīt), n. In firearms, a form of rear sight consisting of a hinged graduated plate called a leaf, which is raised for use, but at other times lies flat on the barrel.

leaf-silver (lēf′sil″vėr), n. Silver-leaf.

leaf-silvering (lēf′sil″vėr-ing), n. Silvering or ★plating with silver-leaf.

leaf-spot (lēf′spot), n. A disease affecting the leaves of the rose, maple, etc., caused by parasitic fungi, Phyllosticta, Septoria, etc. It appears in dark spots on the leaves.

leaf-spring (lēf′spring), n. A long spring which presses together the coupling-hooks of railroad-cars in the Miller coupling.

leafstalk (lēf′stâk), n. The stalk which supports a leaf; the petiole. See first cut under leaf.

leaft. An obsolete or dialectal preterit and past participle of leave[1].

leaf-tailed (lēf′tāld), a. Having the tail shaped like a leaf: applied to geckos of the genus Phyllurus.

leaf-tier (lēf′tī″ėr), n. A phycid moth, Canarsia hammondi. The larvæ feed on the leaves of the apple, either singly or in small companies. In the latter leafwork (lēf'wėrk), n. [= G. laubwerk = Dan. löverk = Sw. löfverk.] Decorative work having the character of leafage, or having a design imitated from or suggested by natural leaves.

leafy (lē'fi), a. [< leaf + *-y*1.] Furnished with, abounding in, or consisting of leaves: as, a leafy stem; a leafy forest; a leafy covert.

In the leafy month of June.
Coleridge, Ancient Mariner, v.

league1 (lēg), n. [< ME. lege, < OF. F. ligue = Sp. Pg. liga = It. lega, < ML. liga, lega, a league or confederacy, < L. ligare, bind: see ligament.] 1. A compact or covenant between persons for the maintenance of joint interests or mutual service; hence, union; close affinity; friendship.

There is such a league between my good man and he!
Shak., M. W. of W., iii. 2. 25.

I myself am in such hearty league
With solitary thoughts, that pensive language Charms my attention. Ford, Lady's Trial, iv. 1.

Fair couple, link'd in happy nuptial league.
Milton, P. L., iv. 339.

Specifically—2. A political or military confederation; a covenanted alliance or coalition, as of persons or parties in a state, or more commonly of the ruling powers of different states, for the promotion of common objects or interests; a compact for mutual aid and support in public policy or war: as, the Hanseatic League; the Holy League in France; the league of Schmalkald.

Howbeit, bycause we pylgrymes were not, as he sayd, comprysed in the sayd leye, he wolde not therfore promys nor warant vs any suerty, but we to stande at oure aduenture. Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 69.

To conclude,
Without the king's will or the state's allowance,
A league between his highness and Ferrara.
Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. ?. 323.

How fair his [William's] Friendship, and his Leagues how just,
Whom ev'ry Nation courts, whom all Religions trust!
Prior, Carmen Seculare (1700), st. 21.

3. A combination of different associations or bodies of persons for the promotion of common purposes: as, a base-ball league.—Achean League, Ætolian League, Hanseatic League, Holy League. See the adjectives.—Land League, in Ireland, a combination of Irish tenant farmers and others, organized by Charles Stewart Parnell in October and November, 1879, under the name of the "Irish National Land League," with the object of procuring reduction of rents, refusing to pay rents if such reduction was not granted, and, finally, of effecting a sweeping change in the land laws, by which peasant proprietors were to be substituted for landlords. The league developed great strength, and became the chief factor in the political movement for home rule in Ireland, also led by Mr. Parnell.—Latin league. See Latin.—Primrose League, in Great Britain, a league or combination of persons pledged to principles of conservatism as represented by Benjamin Disraeli, Earl of Beaconsfield (1804–81), and opposed to the "revolutionary tendencies of Radicalism." The object of the league is declared to be "the maintenance of religion, the constitution of the realm, and of the imperial ascendancy of Great Britain." The scheme of the organization was first discussed at the Carlton Club, in October, 1883, and the actual league made its first public appearance in a grand banquet at Freemasons' Tavern in London a few weeks later. The organization of the league is by "habitations" or clubs; these obey the instructions of the Grand Council, and annually send delegates to the Grand Habitation, which is held in London on or near the 19th of April, the anniversary of the death of Lord Beaconsfield. A noteworthy feature is the enrolment of women, or "dames," who take an active part in all the business of the association, having an executive committee and a fund of their own. The name and symbol of the league are derived from Beaconsfield's favorite flower.—Solemn League and Covenant. See covenant.—To be in league with, to be confederated with; have a compact with: usually with a sinister meaning: as, to be in league with rogues.—Syn. Confederacy, Coalition, etc. (see alliance), society, federation, association, fraternity.

league1 (lēg), v.; pret. and pp. leagued, ppr. leaguing. [< *league*1, n.] I. intrans. To form a league; join in friendship or interest; combine for mutual support; confederate.

Thus sundry motives, more than I can name, Leagued on his part, and she a wife became.
Crabbe, Works, VII. 99.

II. trans. To combine; band; confederate.

Wakeful ambition leagu'd with hasty pride.
P. Fletcher, Upon the Picture of Achmet.

A time came, almost within our own day, when Pope and Turk were really leagued together.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 318.

league2 (lēg), n. [< ME. lege, legge, leghe, < OF. legue (F. lieue) = Pr. lega, legua = Cat. llegua = Sp. Pg. legua, legoa = It. lega, < ML. lega, leuga, leuca, LL. leuca = LGr. λεύγη, NGr. λείγα, a Gallic mile (see below), = AS. leówe, a league. Of Celtic origin; cf. Bret. leó, leu, lev, a league. The Gallic leig, Ir. leige, are from E.] An itinerary unit not now in English use, except as a marine league. (See below.) The league as a unit of length originated in ancient Gaul, where it was equal to 1½ Roman miles, or 1.4 statute miles, improperly termed the Gallic mile. Afterward it was 2,000 paces, and in the middle ages it was in England 2 miles, or nearly 3 statute miles. It is a conventional, not a legal measure. A land-league is sometimes said to be 3 statute miles. The common league of France was 2.764 statute miles; the French posting-league was 2.422 statute miles; the Spanish league was 4.214 statute miles; the Spanish judicial league was 2.634 statute miles; the Flanders league was 3.9 statute miles; the Brabant league was the marine league. The league is still in use in parts of the United States acquired from Mexico, where it is held to be about 2.63 English miles, and a square league 4,428.4 acres. The league is much used in South America. In the greater part of the Argentine Republic, as in Uruguay before 1864, it is equal to 6,000 varas, which, however, are of different lengths in different provinces; and the so-called Argentine league of 5,000 varas exists only in Santiago Del Estero. The postal league, however, varies from 4,000 to 5,000 varas; and in Tucuman the league is sometimes 4,980, sometimes 3,320 varas. The old league of Cuba was 4,906 varas. In Buenos Ayres the league is 5,200 meters, in Rioja 5,035.20 meters, in Colombia 5,000 meters, in Chili 4,513.892 meters, and in Paraguay 4,193 meters.

Thre kennynges ferre on the see: that is, one and twenty leghes ferre. Prose Rom. of Melusine, fol. 61.

And aboute .iij. or .iiij. legges frome thens is the place yt now is desert, where ye woman of Cananee prayde to our Lord for her doughter yt was vexed wt a fende.
Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 47.

From the place whence the Romanes advaunced their standerds unto the barbarians fort it was fourteene leagues: that is to say, one and twentie miles.
Holland, tr. of Ammianus, p. 69.

The Domesday league was only a mile and a half.
Pearson, Historical Maps of Eng., p. 51.

Marine league, a rough unit of length, equal to three geographical or nautical miles (see mile), or one twentieth of a degree of latitude. A nation has exclusive territorial jurisdiction on the high seas for a marine league from its own shore.

leaguer1 (lē'gėr), n. [< OF. and F. ligueur, < ligue, league: see *league*1, v.] A member of a league; a confederate; one who belongs to a league of individuals or parties within a state: as, the French leaguers fought against both Henry III. and Henry IV.

The divisions are so many, and so intricate, of protestants and catholics, royalists and leaguers.
Bacon, Obs. on a Libel.

leaguer2 (lē'gėr), n. [Early mod. E. also leagher, legher; < D. leger = G. lager, a bed, couch, camp, = Dan. lejr, camp, = Sw. läger, camp, also (= Dan. leje) bed, couch, = AS. leger, bed: see *lair*1, of which leaguer is thus ult. a doublet.] 1. A camp; especially, the camp of a besieging army; a besieging force. [Obsolete or archaic.]

Why, they will allow us ne'er a jordan, and then we leak in your chimney. Shak., 1 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 22.

To leak out, to find vent; transpire; find publicity in a clandestine or irregular way: as, the story leaked out.

II. trans. 1. To let out or in (especially some fluid) by an accidental aperture: as, the pipe leaks gas; the roof leaks rain; the camera leaks light.—2†. To make leaky.

After we had with much trouble & charge sente ye Parragon away to sea, and thought all ye paine past, within 14. days after she came againe hither, being dangerously leaked. Quoted in Bradford's Plymouth Plantation, p. 138.

leak† (lēk), a. [= D. lek = LG. lek = G. lech, now usually leck, after LG., = Icel. lekr = Dan. læk = Sw. läck, leaky: see the verb.] Leaky.

Fifty sisters water in leke vessels draw.
Spenser, F. Q., I. v. 35.

I have more to do with my honesty than to fool it,
Or venture it in such leak barks as women.
Fletcher, Wildgoose Chase, ii. 1.

★ leak (lēk), n. [< ME. leke* (?) = D. lek = G. leck = Icel. leki = Dan. læk = Sw. läcka, a leak: see the verb. Cf. leak, a.] 1. An aperture by which anything that can flow, especially water or other fluid, passes out of, into, or through anything intended to contain, exclude, or restrain it; a crack, crevice, fissure, or hole that permits the passage of anything intended to be shut in or out: as, a leak in a cask, ship, dam, or dike; to stop or plug a leak.

If the leak [in a ship's bottom] increases when going ahead at full speed, it is probably forward, otherwise it is abaft. Luce, Seamanship, p. 582.

2. The oozing or passing of a fluid, etc., into, out of, or through anything by an accidental or unintentional aperture or through a permeable medium; leakage.—3. A gutter. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—To spring a leak, to open, split, or part so as to let in water; begin to let in water, as a ship or boat.

leakage (lē'kāj), n. [< leak + -age.] 1. A leaking; a passing, of a fluid, etc., by or as if by leaking.

To accumulate their misfortunes, they were soon obliged to cut away their bowsprit, to diminish, if possible, the leakage at the head.
Anson, Voyage round the World, i. 3.

It is an acknowledged fact that there is a constant leakage of emigrants, who had apparently promised to tarry in Canada, into the United States territories.
Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 536.

2. The quantity that enters or escapes by leaking; loss from leaking: as, the leakage amounts to so much.—3. In com., an allowance of a certain rate per cent. for the leaking of casks, or waste by leaking.

leak-alarm (lēk'a-lärm″), n. A device, comprising a spring-drum, a float to be raised by the water, and an alarm-bell, for sounding an alarm when water accumulates in the hold of a vessel; a leak-indicator or -signal.

leakiness (lē'ki-nes), n. The state of being leaky.

leaky (lē'ki), a. [< leak + *-y*1.] 1. Having a leak or leaks; allowing water or other fluid, etc., to pass in or out through an aperture or apertures: as, a leaky boat; a leaky barrel.

He was put ashore from a leaky vessel.
Steele, Englishman, No. 26.

Prisons were leaky [in the fifteenth century], and . . . a man with a few crowns in his pocket, and perhaps some acquaintance among the officials, could easily slip out.
R. L. Stevenson, François Villon.

Hence—2. Apt to disclose secrets; babbling; tattling.

Women are so leaky that I have hardly met with one that could not hold her breath longer than she could keep a secret. Sir R. L'Estrange.

There is no blab like to the quest'ning fool;
Ev'n scarce before you turn yourself about,

'leap-year' (< MD. schricken, leap forward, start, be startled, be in fear, D. schrikken, be in fear, + jaer, D. jaar, year; so schrikkeldag, the odd day in leap-year, schrikkelmaand, February); Dan. skudaar, Sw. skottår, lit. 'shoot-year'); < leap[1], n., + year. The G. name is schaltjahr, lit. 'intercalary year' (< schalten, insert, intercalate, + jahr, year); L. (LL.) bisextilis annus (> It. anno bisestile, Pg. anno bissexto, Sp. año bisiesto, F. année bissextile), a year containing a second sixth day (sc. before the calends of March) (see bissextile).] A year containing 366 days, or one day more than an ordinary year; a bissextile year. See bissextile. The exact reason of the name is unknown; but it probably arose from the fact that any date in such a year after the added day (February 29th) "leaps over" the day of the week on which it would fall in ordinary years: thus, if March 1st falls on Monday in one year, it will fall on Tuesday in the next if that is an ordinary year of 365 days, but on Wednesday if it is a leap-year.

lear[1] (lēr), v. [Early mod. E. also leer, lere; < ME. leren, teach, learn, < AS. lǣran = OS. lērian, lērean, lēran = OFries. lēra = D. leeren, teach, learn, = MLG. lēren = OHG. lēran, lērran, MHG. lēren, G. lehren = Icel. læra = Goth. laisjan, teach; in form appar. a denominative verb, < AS. lār (= D. leer = OS. There comes thus to be a separation of the originally unitary speech into two parts: a learned dialect, which is the old common language preserved, and a popular dialect, which is its altered descendant.
Whitney, Life and Growth of Lang., ix.

=Syn. 1 and 3. Learned, Scholarly, erudite, deep-read. These words agree in representing the possession of a knowledge obtained by careful and protracted study, especially in books. They differ in that learned expresses depth and fullness in the knowledge, while scholarly expresses accuracy: as, a learned and scholarly treatise upon the use of the dative case. Learned expresses only the result of study; scholarly may express the result or the spirit: as, scholarly tastes. See ignorant.

learnedly (lėr′ned-li), adv. In a learned manner; with learning or erudition; with skill: as, to discuss a question learnedly.

learnedness (lėr′ned-nes), n. The state of being learned; erudition.

learner (lėr′nėr), n. [< ME. lernere, < AS. leornere, a learner, < leornian, learn: see learn.] One who learns; one who acquires knowledge or is taught; a scholar; a pupil.

learning (lėr′ning), n. [< ME. lernyng, < AS. leornung (= OS. lernunga = OHG. lirnunga, lernunga, MHG. lernunge), learning, verbal n. of leornian, learn: see learn.] 1. The act of acquiring knowledge.—2. Systematic knowledge; the information gained from books and instruction; education in general: as, a branch of learning; a low state of learning.

The rootes of learnynge most bytter we deme;
The fruites at last moste pleasaunt doth seme.
Labees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 340.

A little learning is a dangerous thing.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, i. 215.

3. Specifically, profound or extensive literary and scientific culture; erudition: as, a man of learning.

What shall become of that commonwealth or church in the end which hath not the eye of learning to beautify, guide, and direct it? Hooker, Eccles. Polity, vii. 24.

No power of combining, arranging, discerning, Digested the masses he learned into learning.
Lowell, Fable for Critics.

4. That which is learned by study of or application to a particular subject; special knowledge or skill: as, to be deeply versed in the learning of an art or a profession; military or mercantile learning.

Puts to him all the learnings that his time Could make him the receiver of.
Shak., Cymbeline, i. 1. 43.

I once did hold it, as our statists do,
A baseness to write fair, and labour'd much
How to forget that learning.
Shak., Hamlet, v. 2. 35.

The New Learning, the development in England, in the sixteenth century, of the Italian Renaissance. It was led by Colet, Erasmus, Warham, and More.

It was the story of Nowhere, or Utopia, which More embodies in the wonderful book which reveals to us the heart of the New Learning. J. R. Green, Short Hist., v.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Scholarship, Erudition, etc. (see literature); attainments, acquirements.

learnt (lėrnt). An occasional preterit and past participle of learn.

lea-rod (lē′rod), n. Same as lay-rod.

leasable (lē′sa-bl), a. [< lease[2] + -able.] That may be leased; capable of being transferred or held by lease.

lease[1] (lēz), v.; pret. and pp. leased, ppr. leasing. [< ME. lesen, < AS. lesan (pret. læs, pl. lǣson, pp. lesen), gather, = OS. lesan = OFries. lesa = D. lezen, gather, read, = MLG. lesen = OHG. lesan, MHG. G. lesen, gather, read, = Icel. lesa, glean, gather, read, = Dan. læse = Sw. läsa, read, = Goth. lisan (pret. las), gather; cf. Lith. lesti, pick up (corn). For the development of the notion 'read' from 'gather,' cf. L. legere, Gr. λέγειν, gather, read: see legend, collect, etc.] I. trans. 1. To gather; pick; pick up; pick out; select. [Prov. Eng.]

Of wynter fruite science
Yet leseth oute the smale unto the greet,
So that the tree may sende her drinke & mete.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 165.

Specifically—2. To glean, as corn. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. To glean; gather up leavings, as at harvest. [Prov. Eng.]

Ac who so helpeth me to erie or sowen here ar I wende Shal haue leue, bi owre lorde, to lese here in heruest.
Piers Plowman (B), vi. 68.

Agreo, that in harvest used to tease;
But, harvest done, to chair work did aspire;
Meat, drink, and two pence was her daily hire.
Dryden, tr. of Theocritus's Idyls, iii.

lease[2] (lēs), v. t.; pret. and pp. leased, ppr. leasing. [< ME. lesen*, < AF. leser*, OF. laisier, leisseir, lessier, lesser, laxier, F. laisser, let, let go, leave, let out, = Sp. Pg. laxar = It. lasciare, leave, lassare, loosen (ML. reflex lassare, leave), < L. laxare, loosen, < laxus, loose: see lax[1], laxation. Cf. release.] 1. To grant the temporary possession of, as lands, tenements, or hereditaments, to another for compensation at a fixed rate; let; demise.

> This dear, dear land [England] . . .
> Is now leased out, I die pronouncing it,
> Like to a tenement or pelting farm.
> Shak., Rich. II., ii. 1. 59.

> Those not by chance
> Made, or indenture, or leas'd out t' advance
> The profits for a time.
> B. Jonson, Underwoods, lxxxviii. 4.

2. To take a lease of, or to take, as lands, etc., by a lease: as, he leased the farm from the proprietor. ★=Syn. Let, Rent, etc. See hire[1].

lease[2] (lēs), n. [< ME. lese*, < AF. lese, lees, leez*, OF. lais, lays, laiz, leis, les, lees, leez, m. (AL. reflex lessa), a lease, also (F. legs), a thing left by will, a legacy; cf. OF. laisse, lesse, f., a present; from the verb. Cf. lease[5], leash, of the same ult. origin.] 1. A contract transferring a right to the possession and enjoyment of real property for life or for a definite period of time or at will, usually made in consideration of a periodical compensation called rent, in modern times usually payable in money, but sometimes in a share of the produce, and in former times frequently in services. The grantor or landlord is called the lessor, the grantee the lessee. The act of the grantor is called a demise; the right of the grantee is called the term; his holding under it is called a tenancy. The right of the lessor to have possession again at the end of the term, or sooner in case of forfeiture, is called the reversion. If the grantor has only a term and grants the whole of it, the contract is not technically a lease, but, even if in the form of a lease, is deemed only an assignment. If the grantor of a term retains any reversion, even for a single day, the contract is a lease. A contract not transferring a right of possession, but merely contemplating that such right shall be transferred in the future, is not a lease, but an agreement for a lease. A contract transferring such a right to commence in enjoyment at a future day — as, for instance, one executed in February to give possession in May — is a lease; but the right of the lessee for the intervening period before the term is an interesse termini. The word lease is sometimes loosely applied to a letting of personal property.

2. The written instrument by which a leasehold estate is created. The word is also loosely applied to oral contracts of letting, which, however, are made void by the statute of frauds unless for a term not exceeding one year.

> One air gave both their lease of breath.
> Lowell, To Holmes on his Birthday.

3. The duration of tenure by lease; a term of leasing; hence, the terminable time or period of anything: as, to take property on a long lease; a short lease of life.

> In this laziness she [the soul] sleeps out her lease, her term of life, in this death, in this grave, in this body.
> Donne, Sermons, xvii.

> His life is but a three days' lease.
> Lord Maxwell's Goodnight (Child's Ballads, VI. 168).

Custodiam lease. See custodiam. — Emphyteutic lease. Same as bail à longues années (which see, under bail[2]). — Improving lease. See improving, n. — Lease and release, a form of conveyance, now disused, but in common use in England and its American colonies in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, devised to avoid the statute of enrolments, which then required conveyances to be recorded, by taking advantage of the rule that a tenant in possession could take a release without any such act of notoriety.

lease[3]†, a. and n. [< ME. lees, les, leas, loose, false, < AS. leás, loose, false: see loose, a., which has taken the place of the more orig. lease (ME. lees).] I. a. False; lying; deceptive.

leaser[3]† (lē'zėr), n. [< lease[3] + -er[1].] One who tells a falsehood; a liar.

lease-rod (lēs'rod), n. In weaving, one of the wooden rods, usually of oval cross-section, over and under which the warp-threads in a loom are alternately passed in forming the lease. There are usually three of these rods, tied together at the ends. ★See lease[5].

leash (lēsh), n. [< ME. leesshe, leysche, lesshe; a var. of more orig. lease[5] (early mod. E. and still in use in sense 3), < ME. lees, leese, leece, lese, < OF. lesse, F. laisse = It. lascio, < ML. laxa, thong, a loose cord, < L. laxa, fem. of laxus, loose: see lax[1].] 1. A band, lace, or thong; a snare.

> He is caught up in another les.
> Chaucer, Anelida and Arcite, l. 233.

Especially — (a) The line used to hold hounds or coursing-dogs until the time comes to set them on the game.

> They brought him to the heading-hill,
> His hounds intill a leish.
> Young Waters (Child's Ballads, III. 304).

(b†) A pack of hounds. (c) A light line used to give the falcon a short flight without releasing her altogether. It is secured to the varvels on the bird's ankle.

> But her [the hawk's] too faithful leash doth soon retain > Her broken flight, attempted oft in vain.
> Quarles, Emblems, v. 9.

2. Among sportsmen, a brace and a half; three creatures of any kind, especially greyhounds, foxes, bucks, or hares; hence, three things in general.

> Citizens . . . tir'd with toyl, by leashes and by payrs, > Crowned with Garlands, go to take the ayrs.
> Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 5.

> A leash of nightcaps on his head, like the pope's triple crown. Middleton, Your Five Gallants, i. 1.

3. In weaving, one of the threads, cords, or wires extending between the parallel bars or shafts of the harness and having a loop or eye in the middle for the reception of a warp-thread. See heddle.

leash (lēsh), v. t. [< leash, n.] To bind or secure by a leash.

> And at his heels,
> Leash'd in like hounds, should famine, sword, and fire > Crouch for employment. Shak., Hen. V., i. (cho.).

leasing[1] (lē'zing), n. [Verbal n. of lease[1], v.] 1. The act of gathering; gleaning. — 2. An armful of hay or corn, such as is leased or gleaned. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

leasing[2] (lē'sing), n. [Verbal n. of lease[2], v.] The act of letting or taking on lease.

leasing[3] (lē'zing), n. [< ME. leesing, lesing, leesyng, etc., < AS. leásung (= Icel. lausung), falsehood, verbal n. of leásian, lie, < leás, false: see lease[3], loose.] The telling of lies; lying; a lie; falsehood; lying report.

leasow† (lē'sō), n. [Early mod. E. also lessow (also lease: see lease[4]), < ME. leesewe, lesewe, lese, < AS. lǣs (gen. lǣswe, dat. lǣswe, lǣse, pl. lǣswe, lǣswa, lǣse, lǣsa), a pasture.] A pasture.

> In men and cities, castels, fortresses, or other places of defense, in medowes, leassewes, etc.
> Holinshed, Hen. II., an. 1173.

> William Shenstone . . . first saw the light on the patrimonial estate which his taste afterwards made so famous — The Leasowes, Hales Owen, Shropshire.
> Allibone, Dict. Authors, p. 2072.

leasow† (lē'sō), v. t. [Early mod. E. also lessow; < leasow, n.] To feed or pasture.

> Gently his fair flocks lessow'd he along,
> Through the frim pastures, freely at his leisure.
> Drayton, Moses. (Nares.)

least[1] (lēst), a. superl. [< ME. leste, lest, last, < AS. lǣst, contr. of læsast, læsest, lærest, least, superl. of læs (adv. and a.), less (no positive in use): see less[1].] Smallest; little in size or degree, etc., beyond all others: answering as superlative to little.

> I spied a wee wee man,
> He was the least that eir I saw.
> The Wee Wee Man (Child's Ballads, I. 126).

> For I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God. 1 Cor. xv. 9.

At least, at the least, not to say, or that one may not say, more than is certainly true; at the lowest degree: as, if he has not incurred a penalty, he at least deserves censure; it was two hours ago at the least.

> V. hunderyd of his men he lost also,
> And horsis a thowsand atte lest.
> Generydes (E. E. T. S.), l. 2536.

> He who tempts, though in vain, at least asperses
> The tempted with dishonour. Milton, P. L., ix. 296.

Circle of least confusion. See confusion. — In the least, in the smallest degree; at all.

> Acres. It is giving you a great deal of trouble.
> Abs. Not in the least — I beg you won't mention it. — No trouble in the world, I assure you.
> Sheridan, The Rivals, iv. 1.

Least and most†, all; the whole of any number; one and all, great and small. Nares. — Least common multiple. See multiple. — Method of least squares. See square. — Principle of least action. See action. — Principle of least constraint. See constraint.

least[1] (lēst), adv. superl. [< ME. lest, last, < AS. lǣst, contr. of læsast, læsest, lærest, adv., superl. of læs, less: see less[1].] In the smallest or lowest degree; in a degree below all others: as, to reward those who least deserve it.

> With what I most enjoy contented least.
> Shak., Sonnets, xxix.

least[2]†, conj. An obsolete spelling of lest[1].

leastways (lēst'wāz), adv. At least: an obsolete or colloquial form of leastwise.

> There being . . . no two birds in the hand worth one in the bush, as is well known — leastways in a contrairy sense, which the meaning is the same.
> Dickens, Nicholas Nickleby, xxxvii.

At leastways†, at least.

> At least waies, I finde this opinion confirmed by a pretie deuise or embleme that Lucianus alleageth he saw.
> Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 118.

leastwise (lēst'wīz), adv. [< least[1] + -wise.] At least: formerly used with at, with the same force. [Now only colloq.]

> I have from Time to Time employ'd divers of my best Friends to get my Liberty, at leastwise leave to go abroad upon Bail. Howell, Letters, ii. 61.

leasy† (lē'zi), a. [< lease[3], a., + -y.] Counterfeit; fallacious; misleading. [Rare.]

> For studying therebie to make everie thing straight and easie, in smoothing and playning all things to much, never leaveth, whiles the sense itselfe be lefte both lowse and leasie. Ascham, The Scholemaster, ii.

leat[1], leet[3] (lēt), n. [Appar., like lade[2], lode[1], ult. connected with AS. lǣdan, lead: see lead[1].] 1. A meeting of cross-roads. Halliwell. — 2. A watercourse or a trench for conveying water to engine- or mill-wheels. Pryce, 1778. [Cornwall and Devonshire, Eng.] See the quotations.

Plymouth Leat. This artificial brook is taken out of the river Mew, towards its source at the foot of Sheepston Tor in a wild mountain dell. Leat, Late, or Lake, as it is sometimes pronounced, is perhaps a corruption of lead or conductor, being applied, I believe, to any artificial channel for conducting water.

Marshall, Rural Economy of W. of Eng., II. 269.

Drake is connected with the modern life of Plymouth by his construction of the leat, or water-course through which the town is still supplied from the river Meavy.

Worth, Hist. Devonshire, p. 210.

I have a project to bring down a leat of fair water from the hill-tops right into Plymouth town.

Kingsley, Westward Ho, xiv.

leat[2] (lēt), v. i. [Cf. leak.] To leak; pour. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

leath[1] (lēth), a. A dialectal variant of lithe.

leath[2] (lēth), a. A dialectal variant of loath.

leather (leᴛʜ′ėr), n. and a. [Early mod. E. ★lether, < ME. lether, < AS. lether (only in comp.) = OFries. leither, leder, lider, leer = D. leder, leer = MLG. leder, LG. ledder, lier = OHG. MHG. G. leder = Icel. ledhr = Dan. læder, lǣr = Sw. läder, leather; not found native outside of Teut. The W. llethr, Bret. lezr, ler, are of E. or LG. origin.] I. n. 1. The tanned, tawed, or otherwise dressed skin of an animal; dressed hides or skins collectively. The peculiar character of leather is due to the chemical combination of tannin in the process of tanning, or of tannin and vegetable extractive matter (or else of some mineral or earthy base), with gelatin as contained in animal skin; its physical characteristics, such as flexibility, tensile strength, color, and durability, are more or less modified by the processes subsequent to the chemical, and included in the various operations of currying and dressing. In commercial and popular usage leather does not include skins dressed with the hair or fur on; such skins are usually distinguished by compounding the word skin with the name of the animal from which they are taken: as, sealskin, bearskin, otter-skin, etc. In the untanned state skins valued for their fur, hair, or wool, and destined to be tawed and dressed for furriers' and analogous uses, are called pelts or peltry. In England the term pelts is applied to all untanned skins. The term skin has also certain applications relating to leather which seem to follow no rule, but are sanctioned by general usage: thus, leathers made from the skins of kids, dogs, sheep, pigs, and calves, and in general from the skins of all small domestic and of many wild animals, are distinguished by the names of the animals: as, dogskin, sheepskin, pigskin, calfskin, buckskin, or deerskin. Buff-leather is an exception to this usage. (See buff[1], 2.) In general, leather made from skins of adult bovine domestic animals is called cowhide, and that made from skins of horses is called horsehide. The tanned skins of large animals, either wild or domestic, are distinguished by the word hide with the name of the animal from which the skin was taken prefixed, except when the skin has the fur or hair left upon it: as, rhinoceros-hide, hippopotamus-hide, buffalo-hide (tanned with hair removed); leopard-skin, buffalo-skin (tanned or tawed with hair or fur on). Leather made from the skins of alligators and aquatic animals is, however, generally called skin with the name of the animal prefixed: as, alligator-skin, shark-skin, etc. (See also shagreen.) The outer side of the skin both before and after tanning is called the grain side, or simply the grain; the opposite side is called the flesh side.

2. Human skin. [Ironical or ludicrous.]

> His body, active as his mind,
> Returning sound in limb and wind
> Except some leather lost behind.
>
> Swift, To the Earl of Peterborough.

3. A round piece of tanned hide on the end of a fish-hook, designed to keep the bait from sliding up on the line.—4. The loose hanging part of a dog's ear.

The ears of the dog [the Irish water-spaniel] should be long, and so broad in the leather that they will meet across the nose. Sportsman's Gazetteer, p. 425.

Alum leather, tawed leather.—American leather, a kind of varnished or enameled cloth prepared in imitation of leather, used for covering chairs, sofas, etc.—Avignon leather, embossed leather, colored and gilded, used for wall-decoration and for covering furniture: made at Avignon in the seventeenth century, and in all respects similar to that made for the same purpose in Spain.—Basan leather, bark-dyed sheepskin, used in making slippers, etc.—Boiled leather. See cuir-bouilli.—Buff-leather. See buff[1], 2.—Bullock-leather. Same as cow-hide.—Chamois leather. See chamois, 2.—Chrome-leather, leather in which bichromate of potassa solution is used as a steep, the bichromate being by reaction with protosulphate of iron subsequently reduced in the tissue to sesquioxid of chromium.—Cordovan leather. Same as cordwain.—Danish leather, leather prepared by tanning sheep-, goat-, kid-, and lamb-skins with willow-bark. It is strong, supple, and bright-colored, and is used chiefly for gloves.—Enameled leather, leather usually split and coated on one side with varnish, giving it a surface less lustrous than that of patent leather.—Fair leather, leather not artificially colored.—Grained leather. Same as grain-leather.—Harness-leather, bark-tanned leather dressed specially for harness-making. Instead of the ordinary dubbing, the hardest tallow is used for the stuffing, and a great deal of labor is expended upon it with the stockstone and slicker to produce the desired smooth finish on the grain side.—Hogs' leather. Same as hog-skin.—Hungarian leather, a white leather originally brought from Hungary, prepared by a peculiar process similar to tawing, after which it is softened by the application of oil and heat.—Japanned leather. Same as patent leather.—Kip-leather, leather made from the skins of half-grown cattle.—Lace-leather. See whang-leather.—Lacquered leather. Same as patent leather.—Leather appliqué, decorative work made by sewing pieces of kid or other thin leather of different colors on a surface, as of cloth, and completing the design by borderings, scrolls, etc., either of cord or of embroidery-stitching.—Leather-punching machine, a machine for punching leather, in which the action of both the punch and the die is automatic. A cam-wheel and winch actuate the die-stock and the punch, the cam-wheel having a spring attachment which compensates for varying thicknesses of the leather. The leather is fed by hand to the machine.—Leather-splitting machine, a machine for dividing leather into two thicknesses. See split leather.—Leather-stripping machine, a machine by which binding-leather is marked with stripes for shoe-binding.—Leather-stripping machine, a machine for cutting sides of leather into strips of uniform width, from which soles and heels are afterward punched. E. H. Knight.—Leather-washer tool, cutter, or machine, a device for cutting washers from leather. One form resembles the ordinary carpenters' brace and annular bit, having two cutters adjustable in relation with the center of the bit. Leather washers are often cut with circular hollow punches.—Morocco leather. See morocco.—Oiled leather, leather prepared by any process in which oil is an important ingredient.—Oil goat-leather, oiled goatskin.—Pannonia leather. Same as leather-cloth.—Patent leather, leather having a finely varnished surface, prepared from thick leather specially tanned for the purpose. The varnish (sweetmeat) is applied in coats with intermediate drying in a steam-heated oven and in the sun, and smoothing between the applications. Linseed-oil and coloring materials, which may be black or white, etc., are the chief ingredients of the varnish. Also japanned leather, lacquered leather.—Pebble-grained goat-leather, goatskin grained in an irregular manner, as though numerous small pebbles of different sizes had been pressed upon its surface.—Russet leather. (a) Leather finished except coloring and polishing. (b) Leather finished for use without artificial coloring, as that of which shoes are made for use in hot weather. Hence—(c) Leather slightly colored, tinged red or yellowish-brown, for use in the same way.—Russia leather, a fine leather prepared in Russia, and imitated elsewhere, by very careful willow-bark tanning, dyeing with sandalwood, and soaking in birch-oil. It is of a brownish-red color, and has a peculiar and characteristic odor.—Spanish leather, russet and other uncolored leather of the weight and quality used for boots.—Split leather, leather split by a machine. Two thicknesses are thus obtained, either of which may be used, which are better adapted for some uses than the full thickness. The inner layer, of very inferior quality, is used for trunk-covers and similar purposes, and is sometimes finished and used for cheap boots and shoes. Occasionally, however, splitting is done only to secure an even thickness in the outer part, when the operation is more properly called skiving.—Transparent leather, raw hide treated with alum and glycerin, and thus rendered more or less translucent.—Twisted leather, oiled leather twisted from strips into a cord-like form for straps or bands, used with grooved pulleys and for other purposes.—Vegetable leather, a material composed of india-rubber spread upon linen according to a patent process, very tough, and capable of being made of any thickness by additional layers of linen covered and cemented with the india-rubber. It is made in long rolls. Ure, Dict.—Whang-leather, tough leather used for cutting into narrow strips, such as laces, crackers for whips, and small straps. Also called lace-leather.—White leather, tawed leather: so called because the natural color is not darkened by the process, as is the case with tanned leather.

Such armor was much used for defense in addition to the hauberk, greaves, arm-guards, etc., being worn over the link-mail. Helmets also were often made of this material.—Leather belting, leather first shaved to an even thickness, and then cut into strips of definite width which are chamfered off and riveted and cemented together at the ends to form one long piece. The piece thus formed is prepared for market by winding it into a coil like a ribbon. It is used for the straps or belts of pulleys, etc., in machinery.

Hah! old Rowley! egad, you are just come in time to take leave of your old acquaintance.
Sheridan, School for Scandal, iv. 1.

=Syn. Leave, Liberty, License. These words imply that the permission granted may be used or not. Leave is the lightest, is generally personal, and is used on familiar occasions. Liberty is more often connected with more important matters; it indicates full freedom, and perhaps that obstacles are completely cleared from the path. License, primarily the state of being permitted by law, may retain this meaning (as, license to sell intoxicating drinks), or it may go so far as to mean that unlawful or undue advantage is taken of legal permission or social forbearance: as, liberty easily degenerates into license.

leave[2] (lēv), v. t.; pret. and pp. left, ppr. leaving. [< ME. leven, < AS. lȳfan, lēfan, permit, also in comp. ālȳfan, gelȳfan, permit (= OHG. ir-louben, ar-louben, ar-lauban, er-laupan, er-louben, MHG. er-louben, G. er-lauben = Icel. leyfa = Goth. us-laubjan, permit), < leáf, permission: see leave[2], n.] To give leave to; permit; allow; let; grant.

God leve it be my best
To telle it the. Chaucer, Troilus, i. 597.

[The Middle English form leve (that is, as usually written, leue) is often confounded in manuscripts and early printed editions with lene, to grant, lend.

He [God] knoweth what is covenable to every wyht and leueth [var. leneth] hem that he wot that is covenable to hem. Chaucer, Boëthius, iv. prose 6.]

Whether Esau were a vassal I leave the reader to judge.
Locke.

[The verb leave[2], permit, allow, is generally confused with leave[1], permit to remain, quit, etc., from which, however, it differs in construction. Leave[2] is now generally followed by an indirect object of the person, and an infinitive with to: as, I leave you to decide. In vulgar speech leave is often used for let without to: as, leave me be; leave me go.]

leave[3] (lēv), v. i.; pret. and pp. leaved, ppr. leaving. [< leaf[1], n.] Same as leaf.

leave[4]† (lēv), v. t. [< F. lever, raise: see lever[1], levy[1].] To raise; levy.

And after all an army strong she leav'd,

[LL. lecythus, < Gr. λήκυθος, an oil-vase.] In archæol., a small oil- or perfume-vase of ancient Greece, of tall and graceful proportions and narrow neck, used in the toilet. Vases of this form abound, decorated in the usual styles with black or red figures. In Attica a particular class of the lecythus was used, especially in funeral rites. The neck and the foot of these Attic lecythi are covered with a brilliant black varnish, and the intervening part has a clear white ground, upon which are drawn with a brown outline figures and designs, often of remarkable delicacy and elegance, which, unlike nearly all other examples of Greek vase-painting, are frequently filled out with bright and naturalistic colors. Also lekythos.

Attic Lecythi.

led[1] (led). Preterit and past participle of lead[1].

led[1] (led), p. a. Under leading or control: as, a led captain, friend, horse (see phrases below): specifically applied to a landed possession not occupied by the owner or by the person who rents it, or a district ruled over by deputy: as, a led farm, etc.

He transferred the Markgrafdom to Brandenburg, probably as more central in his wide lands; Salzwedel is henceforth the led Markgrafdom or Marck, and soon falls out of notice in the world. Carlyle, Frederick the Great, I. iv.

Led captain†, an obsequious attendant; a favorite that follows as if led by a string; a henchman.

They will never want some creditable led-captain to attend them at a minute's warning to operas, plays, etc. Chesterfield.

Petrie, in his Essay on Good-breeding, . . . recommends . . . this attitude to all led-captains, tutors, dependents, and bottle-holders of every description. Scott, Abbot, xxxix.

Led friend†, a parasite; a hanger-on.

If you take notice, there is hardly a rich man in the world who has not such a led-friend of small consideration, who is a darling for his insignificancy. Steele, Tatler, No. 208.

Led horse, a spare horse led by a groom or servant, to be used in case of emergency; also, a sumpter-horse or pack-horse.

led[2]†, n. An obsolete form of lead[2].

Leda (lē′dă), n. [L., = Gr. Λήδα, a fem. name (see def. 1).] 1. In Greek myth., the wife of Tyndareus, king of Sparta, and mother of Clytæmnestra, Helen, Castor, and Pollux. According to the latest of the many legends, the last three were the offspring of Zeus in the form of a swan, and were produced from two eggs, Helen from one, and Castor and Pollux from the other.

2. In zoöl.: (a) The typical genus of Ledidæ. Schumacher, 1817. (b) A spurious genus of spiders. Koch and Berendt, 1854. (c) A genus of amphipod crustaceans. Wrzesniowski, 1879.

Leda-clay (lē′dă-klā), n. A marine deposit of post-Tertiary age, occurring along the St. Lawrence valley and on the borders of Lake Champlain. The material is a fine clay, deposited in deep water, and contains many molluscan remains, the species being chiefly those now inhabiting the sea further north. Among the genera represented Leda is prominent; hence the name.

ledden†, n. See leden.

ledder, n. An obsolete or dialectal form of ladder.

leddy (led′i), n. A dialectal form of lady.

ledge[1] (lej), n. [An assibilated form of leg* or lig* (cf. ledger[1], lidger, assibilated forms of ligger; legget, ligget, lidget, equiv. to ledge[1], 2); akin to Sc. ledgin, a parapet, leggin, laggen, lagen, the rim of a cask, cf. Icel. lögg = Sw. lagg, the rim of a cask, = Norw. logg (pl. legger), the rim of a cask, the lowest part of a vessel; from the verb represented by E. lie[1], dial. lig: see lie[1]. Cf. ledge[2], as a var. of lay[1], the causal form of lie[1]. Cf. also ledger[1].] 1. A shelf on which articles may be placed; anything which resembles such a shelf; a flat rim or projection: as, the ledge of a window; a ledge of earth on the inner side of a parapet.

And he made ten bases of brass; . . . they had borders, and the borders were between the ledges. 1 Ki. vii. 28.

The lowest ledge or row should be merely of stone. Sir H. Wotton, Reliquiæ, p. 18.

Specifically—(a) In arch.: (1) A small horizontal molding of rectangular profile. (2) A string-course. (b) In joinery, a piece against which something rests, as the side of a rebate against which a door or shutter is stopped, or a projecting fillet serving the same purpose as the stop of a door, or the fillet which confines a window-frame in its place. (c) In ship-building, a piece of the deck-frame of a ship, lying between the deck-beams. (d) A rail of a chair. (e) In printing, one of the pieces of furniture; a wedge, used in locking up a form of type.

2. A shelf-like ridge or elevation; any natural formation somewhat resembling a shelf: as, a ledge at the top of a precipice; a ledge of rock under water. In mining, ledge is a common name in the Cordilleran region for the lode, or for any outcrop supposed to be that of a mineral deposit or vein. It is frequently used, as reef is in Australia, to designate a quartz-vein.

Beneath a ledge of rocks his feet he hides;
Tall trees surround the mountain's shady sides:
The bending brow above a safe retreat provides. Dryden, Æneid, i.

Pines, that plumed the craggy ledge. Tennyson, Œnone.

3. A bar for fastening a gate. [Prov. Eng.]

ledge[2] (lej), v.; pret. and pp. ledged, ppr. ledging. [A dial. var. of lay[1], < ME. leggen, < AS. lecgan, lay: see lay[1]. Cf. ledge[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To lay (eggs). [Prov. Eng.]—2. To lay hands on. [Prov. Eng.]

II. intrans. To lay eggs. [Prov. Eng.]

ledge[3]†, v. t. [ME. ledgen, leggen, by apheresis from alegen, allege: see allege[1].] To allege. Halliwell.

ledged (lejd), a. [< ledge[1] + -ed[2].] Furnished with or consisting of a ledge or ledges; shaped like a ledge; of the character of a ledge.

Ledged and broken walls and floor. L. Wallace, Ben-Hur, p. 395.

Ledged door. See door.

ledgement, n. See ledgment.

ledger[1] (lej′ėr), n. and a. [Formerly also leger, and, in the obs. senses, also leiger, leidger, legier, lieger, ligier; also and most prop. lidger (which is found also in other senses); an assibilated form of ligger, and thus ult. another form of lier[1]; cf. MD. leggher, D. legger, one that lies down, a nether millstone, MD. liggher, a resident guest, a book kept for reference, = MLG. ligger, a resident agent or factor: see ligger, lier[1], and cf. ledge[1], ledge[2]. The origin in the uses now obs. seems to have been forgotten, and the word was spelled irreg. leger, legier, leiger, lieger, etc., appar. in simulation of leger[2], also spelled ledger, light, or of liege, or, with ref. to an ambassador, of legate. A "ledger ambassador" is a resident minister, "a person sent to lie abroad for the good of his country."] I. n. 1. A bar, beam, stone, or other thing that lies flat or horizontal in a fixed position. Specifically—(a) In building, a piece of timber used in forming a scaffolding. Ledgers are fastened to the vertical bars or uprights; they support the putlogs which lie at right angles to the wall, and carry the boards on which the workmen stand. See cut under putlog. (b) In arch., a flat slab of stone, such as is laid horizontally over a grave; the covering-slab of an altar-tomb. (c) In mining, the foot-wall of a vein. Sometimes called the ledger-cheek. [Alston Moor mining district.] (d) In angling, a ledger-bait.

2. The principal book of accounts among merchants and others who have to keep an accurate record of money and other transactions, so arranged as to exhibit on one side all the sums or quantities at the debit of the accounts, and on the other all those at the credit. Formerly also ledger-book.

Here you a muckworm of the town might see,
At his dull desk, amid his legers stall'd,
Eat up with carking care and penurie. Thomson, Castle of Indolence, i.

When only the ledger lives, and when only not all men lie. Tennyson, Maud, i.

3†. A resident; a resident agent; especially, a resident ambassador. For various other spellings, see etymology.

By reason I had bene a lidger in Russia, I could the better reply. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 375.

Lord Angelo, having affairs to heaven,
Intends you for his swift ambassador,
Where you shall be an everlasting leiger. Shak., M. for M., iii. 1. 59.

He's a leiger at Horn's ordinary yonder.
B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour, iv. 4.

4†. A commission-agent: a name formerly given to a Londoner who bought coals of the country colliers at so much a sack, and made his chief profit by using smaller sacks, making pretense he was a country collier. This was termed legering. Nares.

II.† a. 1. Lying in a certain place; laid; laid up; stationary; fixed.

For humours to lie leidger they are seen
Oft in a tavern, and a bowling-green.
Randolph, Poems.

It happened that a stage-player borrowed a rusty musket, which had lien long leger in his shop.
Fuller, Worthies, London.

2. Resident, as an ambassador.

You have dealt discreetly, to obtain the presence
Of all the grave leiger ambassadors
To hear Victoria's trial. Webster, White Devil.

Return not thou, but legier stay behind,
And move the Greekish prince to send us aid.
Fairfax, tr. of Tasso, l. 70.

ledger[2], a. See leger[2].

ledger-bait (lej'ėr-bāt), n. A bait fixed or made to remain in one place, used in fishing.

You may fish for a Pike either with a ledger or a walking bait; and you are to note that I call that a Ledger-bait which is fixed or made to rest in one certain place when you shall be absent from it; and I call that a Walking-bait which you take with you, and have ever in motion. I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 135.

ledger-blade (lej'ėr-blād), n. In cloth-shearing machines, the fixed straight-edged blade which co-acts with a spiral blade or blades on a revolving cylinder, upon the principle of a shears, and which trims off so much of the nap from cloth as to reduce it to a uniform length and give an even surface to the fabric.

ledger-book (lej'ėr-bůk), n. [Formerly also leger-book, ligier-book; < ledger[1] + book.] A book that lies or is kept in a fixed place. Specifically—(a) A monastic cartulary. Halliwell. (b) A book of accounts—now usually ledger. See ledger[1], n., 2.

I find in the said ligier booke a note of the sayd Eyms, of all such goods as he left. Hakluyt's Voyages, II. 98.

This ledger-book lies in the brain behind,
Like Janus eye, which in his poll was set.
Sir J. Davies, Immortal. of Soul, xxi.

ledging (lej'ing), n. [< ledge[1] + -ing[1].] A ledge; also, ledges collectively. [Rare.]

ledgment (lej'ment), n. [< ledge[1] + -ment.] In arch.: (a) A course of horizontal moldings, as the base-moldings of a building. (b) The development of the surface of any solid on a plane, so that the dimensions of its different sides may readily be obtained. Also ledgement, and formerly liggement, legement.

ledgment-table (lej'ment-tā″bl), n. In arch., the projecting part of a plinth. Compare earth-table.

ledgy (lej'i), a. [< ledge[1] + -y[1].] Abounding in ledges.

Ledidæ (led'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leda + -idæ.] A family of dimyarian bivalve mollusks. The mantle-margin is freely open; the siphonal tubes are elongate, retractile, and more or less united; the gills are narrow and plume-like; the labial palps are appendiculate and elongate; the foot is compressed and deeply grooved; the shell is pearly within and oblong; the hinge has numerous transverse teeth; and the ligament is either external or internal. The Ledidæ are called beaked nutshells. About 80 species are known as inhabitants of the cold and temperate seas.

ledon-gum (lē'don-gum), n. [< Gr. λήδον, < Pers. lādān, an Oriental shrub, + E. gum: see ladanum.] The ladanum derived from Cistus Ledon.

Ledum (lē'dum), n. [NL. (Linnæus), < Gr. λήδον, ladanum: see ladanum.] A genus of ericaceous plants of the tribe Ledeæ. It is characterized by a 5-toothed calyx and a 5-celled pod which contains many small thin seeds having a loose coat. The plants are low shrubs with white flowers, and entire, more or less fragrant leaves. There are about 4 species, inhabiting the colder and arctic regions of the northern hemisphere, commonly known as Labrador tea. The leaves of L. Grœnlandicum are said to have been used in the colonies for tea during the war of independence. L. palustre, called marsh-tea and wild rosemary, was formerly used in northern Europe in malt liquors, and is said to be turned to account in Russia for tanning. The genus also occurs in a fossil state.—Ledum-oil, oil of Ledum, an essential oil ★distilled from L. palustre.

lee[1] (lē), n. and a. [< ME. lee, le, shelter, < AS. hleó, a contr. form of hleów, a covering, shelter, > ME. lew, E. dial. lew, shelter: see lew[1]. In the naut. sense lee (like D. lij = G. lee) is of Scand. origin: Icel. hlē = Dan. læ = Sw. lä, lee (of a ship); but cf. leeward in the 2d pron., as if spelled lewward.* The adj. in def. 2 is peculiar to Sc. (also spelled lei, lie), and may be of diff. origin.] I. n. 1. Shelter.

Thenne he lurkkes & laytes where watz le best.
Alliterative Poems (ed. Morris), iii. 277.

2. The quarter toward which the wind blows, as opposed to that from which it proceeds; also, the shelter afforded by an object interposed which keeps off the wind: almost exclusively a nautical term.

Though sorely buffeted by ev'ry sea,
Our hull unbroken long may try a lee.
Falconer, Shipwreck, ii.

Away the good ship flies, and leaves
Old England on the lee.
A. Cunningham, A Wet Sheet and a Flowing Sea.

To lay or bring (a ship) by the lee. See bring.—Under the lee (naut.), on that side which is sheltered from the wind; on the side opposite to that against which the wind blows; in a position protected from the wind; under shelter: as, under the lee of a ship or of the land.

Swiftly they glided along, close under the lee of the island.
Longfellow, Evangeline, ii. 2.

II. a. 1. Naut., of or pertaining to the part or side toward which the wind blows, or which is sheltered from the wind: opposed to weather: as, the lee side of a vessel.

Cachit hom with cables & castyng of ancres,
And logget hom to lenge in that le hauyn.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 4675.

2. Lonely. [Scotch.]—Lee lurch. See lurch[1].—Lee shore, the shore under the lee of a ship, or that toward which the wind blows.—Lee tide, a tide running in the same direction as the wind is blowing.

lee[2]†, n. An obsolete form of lea[1].

lee[3] (lē), v. and n. A dialectal (Scotch) form of lie[2].

lee[4] (lē), n. An obsolete or dialectal form of lye[3].

lee[5] (lē), n. [Early mod. E. lye (in pl. lyes), < ME. lie, pl. lies, < OF. F. lie = Pg. lia, < ML. lia, pl. liæ, lees, the sediment in wine; origin unknown.] The grosser part of any liquor which has settled on the bottom of a vessel; dregs; sediment: as, the lees of wine: usually in the plural, lees, which is sometimes treated as a singular.

With tarrere or gymlet perce ye vpward the pipe ashore,
And so shalle ye not cawse the lies vp to ryse, y warne yow euer more. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 121.

I will drink
Life to the lees. Tennyson, Ulysses.

lee-board (lē'bōrd), n. [= G. leebord = Icel. hlē-bordh; as lee[1] + board.] One of two long flat pieces of wood attached one on each side of a flat-bottomed vessel (as a Dutch galiot) by a bolt on which it traverses. When the vessel is close-hauled the board on the lee side is let down, reaching below the keel, and when the ship is listed over by the wind it resists the tendency to drift too fast to leeward.

Dutch Galiot, with Lee-boards.

lee-bow (lē'bou), v. t. [< lee bow, the lee side of the bow.] 1. Naut., to run ahead and get underneath the lee bow of: as, to lee-bow a vessel while fishing. Hence—2. To take advantage of in any way: as, to lee-bow one in trade. [Colloq.]

leech[1] (lēch), n. [Also leach; < ME. leeche, leche, < AS. lǣce (rarely, and irreg., lǣca) (= OFries. leka, letza, leischa = OHG. lāhhi, lāchi = Dan. læge = Goth. lēkeis), a physician (cf. Icel. læknir, Sw. läkare, a physician, from the associated verbs); perhaps < AS. lāc, a medicine, lit. 'something given' (cf. dose, of same sense), a particular use of lāc, a gift, present, offering, sacrifice, also a battle, struggle, < lācan, play, dance (see lake[2]); but lāc, a medicine, may be of diff. origin. Cf. Ir. liaig, a physician, OBulg. lekŭ, medicine, lekarĭ, a physician, etc. In another view, not at all probable, the word lǣce is supposed to have been orig. associated directly with the notion of 'dancing,' with ref. to the magical formulas of primitive leechcraft. Hence leech[2], n.] A physician; a medical practitioner; a professor of the art of healing. [Now chiefly poetical.]

For whoso liste have helynge of his leche,
To hym behoveth first unwry his wounde.
Chaucer, Troilus, i. 857.

Make war breed peace, make peace stint war, make each Prescribe to other as each other's leech.
Shak., T. of A., v. 4. 84.

leech[1] (lēch), v. t. [< ME. leechen, lechen = Dan. læge = Sw. läka, heal; also, with formative -n, ME. lechnien, < AS. lācnian, lǣcnan = Icel. lǣkna = Goth. leikinōn, heal; from the noun, AS. lǣce, etc., a physician: see leech[1], n.] To treat with medicaments; heal; doctor.

Lame men he lechede with longen of bestes.
Piers Plowman (C), ix. 189.

Let those leech his wounds for whose sake he encountered them. Scott.

leech[2] (lēch), n. [< ME. leche, < AS. lǣce (= MD. laecke), a leech (the worm so named), a particular use (not found in other languages) of leech[1], with ref. to the medicinal value of these worms: see leech[1].] 1. An aquatic, more or less parasitic, and blood-sucking worm; a suctorial or discophorous annelid of the order Hirudinea. There are several families, many genera, and numerous species of these worms. Most of them live in fresh-water ponds and streams, some in moist herbage, and a few in the sea. The body is segmented as in other annelids, but the crosslines on the surface are only superficial, and do not correspond to the anatomical segmentation. There is a sucker at each end of the body, that at the head end being armed a, mouth; b, b, b, sacculation of alimentary canal; c, anus; d, terminal sucker; e, cerebral ganglia; f, f, chain of postesophageal ganglia; g, g, g, segmental organs.

with biting jaws. The body is usually flattened, broadest toward the tail, but tapering to each end; the color is generally dark, variously mottled, striped, or dotted with lighter or brighter color. The ordinary medicinal leech belongs to a genus known as Hirudo or Sanguisuga, in which there are three jaws in the form of small white serrated teeth which inflict the peculiar triradiate leech-bite. The common brown, speckled, or English leech is H. or S. medicinalis (officinalis), of which the Hungarian green or officinal leech, H. or S. officinalis, is a variety. The European horse-leech is Hæmopis sanguisorba. Another species, Aulastoma gulo, is also called horse-leech. Some leeches attain a length of 2½ feet, as Macrobdella valdiviana. Macrobdella decora is an American leech. Ichthyobdella punctata is a leech found on the whitefish in the Great Lakes. Leeches are used in medicine to extract blood by sucking it.

2. Figuratively, one who, as it were, sucks the blood or steals the substance of his victim, or persistently holds on for sordid gain.—Artificial leech, or mechanical leech, a small cupping instrument used for drawing blood.

leech[2] (lēch), v. t. [< leech[2], n.] To apply leeches to, for the purpose of bleeding.

leech[3] (lēch), n. [Also leach; not found in ME.; < Icel. līk, a leech-line, = Dan. lig = Sw. lik, a bolt-rope, = MD. lyken, a bolt-rope; further origin obscure.] Naut., the perpendicular or sloping edge of a sail. In fore-and-aft sails only the after edge is called the leech, the forward edge being called the luff.

leech[4], v. and n. See leach[2].

leechcraft (lēch'kraft), n. [Also leachcraft; < ME. leche-craft, < AS. lǣce-cræft, the art of medicine, a medicine, < lǣce, a leech, physician, + cræft, craft.] 1. The art of healing. [Archaic.]

We study speech, but others we persuade;
We leach-craft learn, but others cure with it.
Sir J. Davies, Immortal. of Soul, Int.

2†. Medical attendance.

leechdom (lēch'dum), n. [< ME. lechedom, < AS. lǣcedōm (= OHG. lāchintuom, lāhhitoam, lāhtuam, lāhtōm, MHG. lāchenduom, lēchentuom = Icel. lækidōmr = Dan. lægedom), medicine, a medicine, < lǣce, physician, leech, + dōm, law, jurisdiction: see leech[1] and -dom.] 1. Medicine.—2. A medicine; a medical formula. [Obsolete or archaic in both uses.]

Some of these charms are of Eastern origin, many are found in Greek and Latin writers, many are Scandinavian, and one, at least, is given as Gaelic. They are leechdoms, and not witchcraft, at least in name; and from their frequent use of Holy Writ they evidently had priestly sanction. N. and Q., 7th ser., III. 278.

leech-eater (lēch'ē″tėr), n. A kind of plover found in Egypt, either Hoplopterus spinosus or Pluvianellus ægyptius.

leek (lēk), n. [< ME. leek, < AS. leác, a leek, an herb, = D. look = LG. look = OHG. louh, MHG. louch, G. lauch = Icel. laukr = Dan. løg = Sw. lök, leek. Cf. OBulg. lukŭ = Serv. luk = Pol. łuk (barred l) = Russ. lukŭ = Lith. lukai = Finn. laukha, leek, all of Teut. origin. The word occurs now unfelt as the final element in garlic, but prob. not, as usually stated, in charlock, hemlock, or barley[1]: see these words.] One of several species of the genus Allium; especially, a biennial culinary plant, Allium Porrum. It is distinguished from the onion (A. Cepa) by having a cylindrical base instead of a spherical or flattened bulb, by its flat leaves, and by its milder flavor. It is stimulant and diuretic. The cultivated leek is believed to have originated from the wild leek, A. Ampeloprasum, found in southern Europe and western Asia. It was probably cultivated in ancient Egypt, and may have been the plant called by that name in Numbers xi. 5. According to Pliny, it was made prominent among the Romans by Nero; and at the present day it is still in extensive use. The leek has long been the national badge of the Welsh, traditionally said to have been adopted by direction of St. David, in celebration of a victory of King Arthur over the Saxons. The crow-leek is the bluebell squill, Scilla nonscripta; the sand-leek, Allium Scorodoprasum, found in sandy places in the middle latitudes of Europe; the stone-leek, A. fistulosum, known as Welsh onion; the vine-leek, A. Ampeloprasum; the wild leek, A. Ampeloprasum, A. ursinum, and, in America, A. tricoccum. (See also house-leek.)

Leek (Allium tricoccum.)
1, flowering plant; 2, the plant with the leaves developed; a, flower; b, fruit; c, seed.

He is come to me, and prings me pread and salt yesterday, look you, and bid me eat my leek.
Shak., Hen. V., v. 1. 10.

Leek to the Welsh, to Dutchmen butter 's dear.
Gay, Shepherd's Week, Monday, l. 83.

Not worth a leek, of no value. Compare not worth a cress or curse, under curse[2].

Thou flisshes not worth a leke, rise & go thi ways.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 204.

To eat the leek, to make a retraction or submit to humiliating treatment from compulsion: in allusion to the scene between Fluellen and Pistol in Shakspere's "Henry V." See the quotation from Shakspere, above.

Here is a case in which they were made to eat the leek.
Ashton, Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, II. 231.

Lyly, Euphues, Anat. of Wit, p. 79.

leer[7] (lēr), n. [Also lear and lier, and perhaps merely another spelling of lier[1] as pronounced dialectally lē′er.] In glass-manuf., an annealing-furnace in which glassware is slowly cooled and annealed. It consists usually of a long chamber with a furnace at one end and having either a track of rails over which the glass is moved on cars through the furnace or a traveling apron for the same purpose.

leernesst, n. [Early mod. E. lereness, < ME. lereness, < AS. lǣrness, emptiness, < lǣre*, empty: see leer[3].] Emptiness. Batman, 1582. (Halliwell.) leer-pan (lēr′pan), n. A shallow iron tray in which are placed objects to be annealed in a furnace. See leer[7].

Leersia (lār′si-ä), n. [NL., named after Johann Daniel Leers, a German druggist and botanist.] A name given by Swartz in 1788 to Homalocenchrus, a genus of grasses. It is closely related to the genus Oryza (to which rice belongs), but differs from it in having only two glumes instead of four, and often less than six stamens. The plants are marsh-grasses with narrow leaves which often have sharp, roughened edges that cut the flesh of those who pass through places where they grow. Five species are known, all of which occur in America, but one of them, Homalocenchrus oryzoides, is also found in Europe and temperate Asia, and another, H. hexandrus, is widely distributed throughout the tropical regions of the old world. Three species occur in the United States, and are known as white-grass, especially H. Virginicus. H. oryzoides is the rice cut-grass, and H. lenticularis the fly-catch grass. The name Leersia was given six years earlier to a genus of mosses, but it has been abandoned to restore to the grass genus its original name Homalocenchrus, proposed by Mieg in 1768.

leerspool (lēr′spöl), n. [< leer[3] + spool.] A cane or reed. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

leet[1] (lēt), n. [Cf. lathe[3], lath[2], < AS. lāth, a territorial division: see lathe[3].] 1. An ancient English court; originally, the assembly of the men of a township for administering the law of the community. See court-leet.

M. Lambert seemeth to be of the opinion that the leets of our time doo yeeld some shadow of the politike institution of Alfred. Holinshed, Descrip. of England, ii. 4.

Who has a breast so pure,
But some uncleanly apprehensions Keep leets and law-days, and in session sit
With meditations lawful?
Shak., Othello, iii. 3. 140.

2. The district subject to the jurisdiction of a court-leet.

In their renewal of this system the Commons seem to make sheriffs in their leets answer for the provincial synod.
R. W. Dixon, Hist. Church of Eng., iii.

3. The day on which a court-leet was held; also, the right to hold such a court, which in later times could be granted to a baron.—Grand leet, the chief assembly.

In the grand-leets and solemn elections of magistrates, every man had not prerogative alike.
Holland, tr. of Livy, p. 25.

leet[2] (lēt), n. [Appar. < Icel. leiti, a share, a part; but cf. AS. hlēt, hlȳt, hliét, var. forms of hlot, lot, share: see lot.] 1. One portion; a lot.—2. A list of candidates for any office.—Short leet, a list of persons selected as the most eligible of the candidates for any office in order that their claims may be more particularly considered in view of nomination.

And leveth swych lorels for her lowe wordes.
Quoted in Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. xlv.

leeve[2]†, v. An obsolete form of leave[1].

leeward (lē'wärd; pron. by seamen lū'ärd), a. and n. [< lee[1] + -ward. The pron. lū'ärd is prob. due to a form lewward*, the forms lee and lew being ult. identical: see lee[1], lew[1].] I. a. Pertaining to the quarter toward which the wind blows; being in the direction of the wind: opposed to windward: as, a leeward course.—Leeward tide, a tide running in the same direction that the wind blows, and directly contrary to a tide under the lee, which implies a stream in an opposite direction to the wind.

II. n. The point or direction opposite to that from which the wind blows: as, to fall to leeward.

leeward (lē'wärd; by seamen, lū'ärd), adv. [= D. lijwaarts = G. leewärts = Sw. lävart. See leeward, a.] Toward the lee, or that part toward which the wind blows: opposed to windward.

leewardly (lē'wärd-li; by seamen, lū'ärd-li), a. Making much leeway when sailing close-hauled: applied to ships that are not weatherly or cannot sail close to the wind without making great leeway. See weatherly.

leewardness (lē'wärd-nes; by seamen, lū'ärd-nes), n. Tendency to make leeway; lack of weatherliness.

But such was the leewardnesse of his Ship that, though he was within the sight of Cape Henry, by stormy contrary winds was he forced so farre to Sea that the West Indies was the next land.
Quoted in Capt. John Smith's Works, I. 165.

★ leeway (lē'wā), n. 1. The lateral movement of a ship to the leeward of her course, or the angle formed between the line of the ship's keel and the line which she actually describes through the water; the deviation from her true course which a vessel makes by drifting to leeward. Hence—2. Loss of progress in general; a falling behind; retrogression: as, to be making leeway financially.—To make up leeway, or make up for leeway, to make up for time lost; overtake work which has fallen behind.

leeze (lēz). [In the phrase leeze me, appar. a contr. of lief is me, that is, it is pleasing to me.] It is pleasing: used in the expression leeze me on (a person or thing), equivalent to I love. [Scotch.]

But leeze me on thee, my little black mare.
Archie of Ca'field (Child's Ballads, VI. 90).

O leeze me on my spinning-wheel,
O leeze me on my rock an' reel.
Burns, Bess and her Spinning-Wheel.

lef[1]†, lefe†, n. Obsolete forms of leaf.

lefe†, a. An obsolete form of lief.

lefesel†, lefsel†, n. [ME., also lefsal, leefesel, lefesal, levesel, levesele, etc. (= Sw. löfsal = Dan. løvsal), an arbor, < AS. leáf, leaf, + sele, a hall, a room: see leaf and saloon. Cf. lobby, orig. of like meaning and ult. connected with leaf.] A bower of leaves; a place covered with foliage; an arbor.

[They] lurkyt vnder lefe-sals loget with vines, Busket vndur bankes on bourders with-oute.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 1167.

left[1] (left), a. and n. [< ME. left, lift, luft, left, < AS. lyft, left, weak, worthless, forms found only in comp., lyft-ādl, palsy (< lyft, weak, + ādl, disease), and the gloss "inanis, left" (not found in the deflected sense 'left,' for which the AS. word is winster), = MD. luft, lucht, left, = North Fries. leeft, left; the lit. sense, found only in AS., is 'weak,' orig. 'broken,' ult. = L. ruptus, broken: see rupture. Cf. lop[2], cut off, maim, etc. The left hand or arm is thus the 'weak' one, as compared with the right, which is stronger because in more active use. The term has been extended, with mere ref. to position, to the leg, ear, eye, cheek, side, etc. The common explanation, that the left hand is that which is usually 'left' unused (as if from the pp. of leave[1]), is erroneous. The L. lævus = Gr. λαιός = Russ. lievuii, left, is not akin to the E. word.] I. a. 1. Belonging to that side of the body of man and other animals which is directed toward the west when the face or front is turned to the north; sinistral: the opposite of right: as, the left hand, arm, leg, ear, or eye; the heart beats on the left side of the body.

Let nat thy lyft half, oure lord techeth,
Ywite what thow delest with thy ryht syde.
Piers Plowman (C), iv. 75.

This bridle bost with gold
I beare in my left hande.
Gascoigne, Philomene (ed. Arber), p. 114.

Then Johnny looked over his left shoulder.
Johnie Armstrang (Child's Ballads, VI. 43).

2. Being on the left-hand side; situated on the side toward which the left hand of a person is or is supposed to be turned. The left wing of an army is the part or division on the left side of the center when facing an enemy. The left bank of a river is that which is on the left hand of a person who is going in the direction of its current. The left side of a deliberative assembly is that on the left hand of the presiding officer. In heraldry, the left (or sinister) is the spectator's right.

Upon the lyfte way, men goon fyrst un to Damas, by Flome Jordane; uppon the rygt syde, men goon thorewe the Lande of Flagam. Mandeville, Travels, p. 128.

Left bower. See bower[6].—Over the left shoulder. Same as over the left (which see, under II.).

II. n. 1. The left-hand side; the side opposite to the right: as, turn to the left (hand); the left (wing) of an army; to wheel from right to left.

Lying, robed in snowy white
That loosely flew to left and right.
Tennyson, Lady of Shalott.

2. In the politics of continental Europe, that part of a legislative assembly which sits on the left of the president; specifically, the liberal or democratic party, as that party, according to custom, always sits on this side of the house. [Usually with a capital letter.]—3†. A worthless creature.

The kynge knewe he seide sothe for Conscience hym tolde,
That Wronge was a wikked luft and wrougte moche sorwe.
Piers Plowman (B), iv. 62.

In music and stage directions abbreviated L.

Left about! See about.—Over the left, or over the left shoulder (see above), not at all: indicating negation, or the contrary of what is stated or ordinarily meant: as, he's a very clever fellow—over the left. [Colloq. or slang.]

You will have an account to keep too; but an account of what will go over the left shoulder; only of what he squanders, what he borrows, and what he owes and never will pay. Richardson, Clarissa Harlowe, I. 242.

left[1] (left), adv. [< left[1], a. and n.] Toward the left; sinistrad: as, they scattered right and left.

Shall not Love to me,
As in the Latin song I learnt at school,
Sneeze out a full God-bless-you right and left?
Tennyson, Edwin Morris.

left[2] (left). Preterit and past participle of leave[1], leave[2].

left-handed (left'han'ded), a. 1. Having the left hand or arm stronger and more capable of being used with facility than the right; using the left hand and arm in preference to the right.—2. Characterized by direction or position toward the left hand; moving from right to left: as, a left-handed quartz crystal (one which rotates the plane of polarization to the left). See levogyrate and polarization.

Herschel found that the right-handed or left-handed character of the circular polarization corresponded, in all cases, to that of the crystal. Whewell.

3. Clumsy; awkward; inexpert; unskilful.

Histo. What kind of man?
Piso. That thou mayst know him perfectly, he's one Of a left-handed making, a lank thing.
Beau. and Fl., Captain, iii. 5.

4. Insincere; sinister; malicious.

The commendations of this people are not always left-handed and detractive. Landor.

Be ungracious, yet we cannot want that hand.
Donne, To the Countess of Bedford.

2. Awkwardness; clumsiness.

left-hander (left'han'dėr), n. 1. A left-handed person.

Let us pass on to the case of left-handers.
Proc. Soc. Psych. Research, III. 42.

Turning leftward, we approach the Troitzkij Bridge.
Harper's Mag., LXXIX. 202.

lefult, a. See leveful.

leg (leg), n. [Early mod. E. also legge; < ME. ★leg, pl. legges, < Icel. leggr, a leg, a hollow bone, = Dan. læg = Sw. lägg, the calf of the leg. The AS. word for 'leg' was scanca (> E. shank); the G. word is bein (= E. bone[1]).] 1. One of the two lower limbs of man, or any one of the limbs of an animal which support and move the body. Specifically—(a) A lower limb or posterior extremity; a limb which is not an arm or a wing. (b) The part of a lower limb which lies between the knee and the ankle: the crus: distinguished from thigh and foot. (See cut under crus.) In vertebrates the parts called legs are never more than two pairs. When both pairs are used in supporting and moving the body, they are distinguished as fore legs and hind legs, as in all ordinary quadrupeds. A limb not used in support is known by some other name, as wing, fin, arm, etc. In about three fourths of the animal kingdom there are six legs, in three pairs, as in the whole class of Insecta proper (hence called Hexapoda). The arachnidans have normally four pairs of legs. All the higher crustaceans have five pairs of legs, and are hence called Decapoda. In some arthropods there are more than 100 pairs of legs, whence the terms centiped, milleped, etc. Leg is often used synonymously with foot. Many parts of invertebrates which are legs in a morphological sense become other kinds of limbs or members, as mouth-parts, chelæ, falces, etc.

Her fine foot, straight leg, and quivering thigh.
Shak., R. and J., iii. 1. 19.

The lone hern forgets his melancholy,
Lets down his other leg, and, stretching, dreams
Of goodly supper in the distant pool.
Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

2. Some object resembling a leg in use, position, or appearance: as, the legs of a table or chair; the legs of a pair of dividers; the legs of a triangle (the sides, as opposed to the base, especially the sides adjacent to a right angle); the leg of an angle, or of a hyperbola.

Joint-stools were then created; on three legs
Upborne they stood. Cowper, Task, i. 19.

I have seen a leg of a rainbow plunge down on the river running through the valley.
Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 336.

Hence—3. Something that serves for support, moral or physical.

The sprightly voice of sinew-strength'ning pleasure
Can lend my bed-rid soul both legs and leisure.
Quarles, Emblems, iv. 5.

Worthy but weak Mr. Brandon,
You haven't a leg to stand on.
Jean Ingelow, Off the Skelligs, xxii.

4. The part of a pair of trousers or drawers, or of a stocking, that covers the leg.—5. In cricket: (a) The part of the field that lies to the left of and behind the batsman as he faces the bowler: as, to strike a ball to leg.

A beautifully pitched ball for the outer stump, which the reckless and unfeeling Jack catches hold of, and hits right round to leg for five, while the applause becomes deafening. T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, ii. 8.

(b) The fielder who occupies that part of the field known as leg. Also long-leg.—6. A sharper: same as black-leg, 3. [Slang.]

He was a horse chaunter: he's a leg now. Dickens, Pickwick, xlii.

Now and then a regular leg, when he's travelling to Chester, York, or Doncaster, to the races, may draw other passengers into play, and make a trifle, or not a trifle, by it; or he will play with other legs. Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 501.

7. Naut.: (a) The run made by a ship on one tack when beating to windward. (b) One of two small ropes spliced together, by which a buntline or leech-line is fastened to the foot or leech of a sail.—Abdominal legs. See abdominal.—Artificial legs, supports imitating the natural leg, used by persons who have undergone amputation. They are made of various materials, such as wood, vulcanite, gutta-percha, rawhide, splints crossed at right angles and glued together, etc., and are often provided with ingenious combinations of joints and springs to imitate as far as possible the natural motions. Light artificial legs are commonly called cork legs, but cork is now seldom used in them, willow-wood being found preferable.—Barbados leg, pachydermia, or elephantiasis Arabum. See pachydermia.—Cursorious legs. See cursorious.—False legs of caterpillars, the fleshy abdominal legs, or prop-legs, which disappear in the perfect insect. See cut under Amara.—Fossorial legs. See fossorial.—Hyperbolic leg. See hyperbolic.—In high leg, much excited or exultant; in high feather. [Rare.]

—— is not returned: the Mufti in high leg about the Spaniards. Sydney Smith, To Lady Holland, Oct. 8, 1808.

Leg-and-foot guard. See guard.—Leg-of-mutton sleeve. See sleeve.—On one's last legs. See last[5], a.—On one's legs, standing, especially to speak: as, to be able to think on one's legs.

Meanwhile the convention had assembled, Mackenzie was on his legs, and was pathetically lamenting the hard condition of the Estates. Macaulay, Hist. Eng.

The leg business, ballet-dancing. [Low.]

I was merely telling your Grace what Mrs. Theobald was. . . . "She was," says Adonis, . . . "in the leg business, your Grace." Miss Annie Edwardes, Ought we to Visit her?

To change the leg, to change from one gait to another: said of a horse.

The chestnut . . . is in a white lather of foam, and changes his leg twice as he approaches. Lawrence, Guy Livingstone, ix.

To fall on one's legs. Same as to fall on one's feet (which see, under fall[1]).

A man who has plenty of brains generally falls on his legs. Bulwer, Night and Morning, iii. 3.

To feel one's legs, to begin to support one's self on the legs, as an infant. [Colloq.]

Remarkably beautiful child! . . . Takes notice in a way quite wonderful! May seem impossible to you, but feels his legs already! Dickens, Cricket on the Hearth, i.

To find one's legs. See find.—To give a leg to, to assist by supporting the leg, as in mounting a horse.

The wall is very low, Sir, and your servant will give you a leg up. Dickens, Pickwick, xvi.

To have a bone in one's leg. See bone[1].—To have the legs of one, to be quicker in running. [Slang.]

The beggar had the legs of me. Macmillan's Mag., March, 1861, p. 357.

To make a leg†, to make a bow or act of obeisance (in allusion to the throwing back of one leg in performing the act).

He that cannot make a leg, put off 's cap, kiss his hand, and say nothing, has neither leg, hands, lip, nor cap. Shak., All's Well, ii. 2. 10.

Making low legs to a nobleman,
Or looking downward, with your eye-lids close. Marlowe, Edward II.

We are just like a Child; give him a Plum, he makes a Leg; give him a second Plum, he makes another Leg. Selden, Table-Talk, p. 109.

To put the boot on the wrong leg. See boot[2].—To shake a leg, to dance. [Low.]—To shake a loose leg, to lead an independent and generally licentious life. [Low.]—To show a leg, to get up from or out of bed. [Low.]—To try it on the other leg, to try the only other possible means or resource. [Colloq.]—Upon its legs, established; in a stable or prosperous condition.

"When the paper gets upon its legs"—that was the only answer he received when he asked for a settlement. The Century, XXXVII. 305.

leg (leg), v. i.; pret. and pp. legged, ppr. legging. [< leg, n.] 1. To pass on; walk or run nimbly: often with an indefinite it. [Prov. Eng. and Scotch, or slang.]

The fool doth pass the guard now,
He'll kiss his hand and leg it. Shirley, Bird in a Cage, v. 1.

★2†. To make a reverence.

leg. An abbreviation of legato.

legable (leg'ą-bl), a. [< NL. as if legabilis*, < L. legare, send, bequeath: see legacy.] Capable of being bequeathed. Bailey.

legacy (leg'ą-si), n.; pl. legacies (-siz). [< ME. legacie, < OF. legacie (found only in sense of 'legateship') = Sp. legacía = Pg. legacia, < ML. as if legatia*, for L. legatum (> It. legato = Sp. legado; cf. Pg. legado, bequeathed), a bequest, < legatus, pp. of legare, bequeath: see legate. The F. legs, a legacy, is not related; it is a bad spelling of OF. lais: see lease[2], n.] 1. Money or other property left by will; a bequest; specifically, a gift of personalty by will as distinguished from a devise or gift of realty.

Yea, beg a hair of him for memory,
And, dying, mention it within their wills,
Bequeathing it as a rich legacy
Unto their issue. Shak., J. C., iii. 2. 141.

Samborus bestowed by legacie his goods and possessions vpon the saide Order, receiuing maintenance and exhibicion from the saide Order, during the terme of his life. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 145.

2. Anything bequeathed or handed down by an ancestor or a predecessor.

3†. A business which one has received from another to execute; a commission; an errand.

He came and told his legacy. Chapman, Iliad, vii. 348.

4†. Legation; embassy.

Offa by often legacies solicited Charles le maigne, the king of France, to be his friend. Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 125.

Cumulative legacies. See cumulative.—Demonstrative legacy, a legacy in which the thing or money is not specified or distinguished from all others of the same kind, but a particular fund is pointed out for its payment, as a gift of $1,000 worth of securities to be taken from testator's stocks and bonds, or a certain sum out of a bank-deposit.—General legacy, a legacy of a specified quantity of money or other commodity, payable out of the personal assets generally; one which does not necessitate delivering any particular thing, or paying money exclusively out of any particular part of the estate, as a specific legacy does.—Legacy duty, a duty to which legacies are subject, for purposes of revenue, as in Great Britain, the rate of which rises according to the remoteness of the relationship of the legatee, and reaches its maximum where he is not related to the testator. In the State of New York a uniform tax of five per cent. on legacies is called collateral inheritance tax.—Residuary legacy, a gift of whatever remains after satisfying other gifts.—Specific legacy, the bequest of a particular thing or money, specified and distinguished from all others of the same kind, as a picture, or the money in a particular bag. Thus, a bequest of a diamond ring is general; a bequest of my diamond ring is specific.—Vested legacy. See vested.

legacy-hunter (leg'ą-si-hun″tėr), n. One who seeks to obtain a legacy or legacies by flattery, servility, or other artifice.

The legacy-hunter, however degraded by an ill-compounded appellation in our barbarous language, was known, as I am told, in ancient Rome, by the sonorous titles of "captator" and "hæredipeta." Johnson, Rambler, No. 197.

legacy-hunting (leg'ą-si-hun″ting), n. An eager pursuit of legacies.

legal (lē'gal), a. and n. [< F. légal = Pg. Sp. legal = It. legale, < L. legalis, legal, < lex (leg-), law, ult. akin to E. law: see law[1]. Cf. leal and loyal, doublets of legal.] I. a. 1. Pertaining or relating to law; connected with the law: as, legal doctrines or studies; a legal document or controversy; legal arguments.—2. According or conformable to law; permitted or warranted by the law or laws; lawful; not forbidden by law; having the force of law: as, the action is strictly legal; legal traffic or commerce.—3. Pertaining to the provisions or administration of the law; determined by or in accordance with law; judicial: as, legal proceedings; a legal opinion or decision; a legal standard or test.—4. Amenable to remedy or punishment by law as distinguished from equity: as, legal waste; legal irregularity.—5. Created by law; recognized by law: as, legal incapacity; a legal infant; legal crimes.—6. In theol., according to the Mosaic law or dispensation; according or pertaining to the doctrine of reliance on good works for salvation, as distinguished from that of free grace.—Legal assets, those assets which are subject to common-law process; such assets as do not require the intervention of equity to be recognized as assets.—Legal compulsion. See compulsion.—Legal debts, debts that are recoverable in a court of common law, as a bill of exchange or a bond; a simple contract debt, as distinguished from liabilities enforceable only in equity.—Legal estate, an estate in land recognizable as such in a court of common law. See equitable estate, under estate.—Legal fiction, fraud, holiday. See the nouns.—Legal interest. See interest, 7.—Legal memory, necessity, person, relation, etc. See the nouns.—Legal representatives. See representative.—Legal reversion, in Scots law, the period within which a debtor whose heritage has been adjudged is entitled to redeem the subject—that is, to disencumber it of the adjudication by paying the debt adjudged for.—Legal tender. See tender.—Syn. 2 and 3. Legitimate, etc. (see lawful); legalized, authorized, allowable, just, constitutional.

II. n. In Scots law, same as legal reversion (which see, under I.).—Expiry of the legal. See expiry.

legalisation, legalise. See legalization, legalize.

legalism (lē'gal-izm), n. [< legal + -ism.] 1. Strict adherence to law or prescription; belief in the efficacy of adhering strictly to the requirements of the law. Specifically—2. In theol., the doctrine that salvation depends on strict observance of the law, as distinguished from the doctrine of salvation through grace; also, the tendency to observe with great strictness the letter of religious law, rather than its spirit.

Leave, therefore, . . . mysticism and symbolism on the one side; cast away with utter scorn geometry and legalism on the other. Ruskin.

His [Zwingli's] profound respect for the letter of the Bible led him to legalism and extreme Sabbatarianism. Encyc. Brit., XXII. 790.

legalist (lē'gal-ist), n. [< legal + -ist.] One who practises or inculcates strict adherence to law; specifically, in theol., one who regards conformity to the law as the ground of salvation, or who is rigorous in exacting obedience to the letter of the law.

They [the Jews] were rigid monotheists and scrupulous legalists, who would strain out a gnat and swallow a camel. Schaff, Hist. Christ. Church, I. § 17.

★legality (lē-gal'i-ti), n. [< F. légalité = Sp. legalidad = Pg. legalidade = It. legalità, < ML. legalita(t-)s, lawfulness, < L. legalis, legal: see legal. Cf. lealty and loyalty, doublets of legality.] 1. The state or character of being legal; lawfulness; conformity to law.

The legality was clear, the morality doubtful. T. Hook, Gilbert Gurney.

The agreement of an action with the law of duty is its legality; that of the maxim with the law is its morality. Abbott, tr. of Kant's Metaph. of Morals.

2. In theol., a reliance on works for salvation; insistence on the mere letter of the law without regard to its spirit: personified in the quotation.

He to whom thou wast sent for ease, being by name Legality, is the son of the bond-woman which now is, and is in bondage with her children; and is, in a mystery, this mount Sinai, which thou hast feared will fall on thy head. Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, i.

legalization (lē″gal-i-zā'shon), n. [< legalize + -ation.] The act of legalizing. Also spelled legalisation.

legalize (lē'gal-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. legalized, ppr. legalizing. [= F. légaliser = Sp. legalizar = Pg. legalisar = It. legalizzare; as legal + -ize.] 1. To make lawful; render conformable to law, either by previous authorization or by giving the sanction of law to what has already been done; authorize; sanction; justify.—2. In theol., to interpret or apply Scripture in the spirit of legalism.

Also spelled legalise.

legally (lē'gal-i), adv. In a legal manner; lawfully; according to law; in a manner permitted by law.

legalness (lē'gal-nes), n. Legality.

legal-tender (lē'gal-ten'dėr), a. That can be lawfully used in paying a debt: as, legal-tender currency; legal-tender money. See tender.

legantine (leg'an-tin), a. Same as legatine.

legatary (leg'a-tā-ri), n.; pl. legataries (-riz). ★[= F. légataire = Sp. Pg. It. legatario, < L. legatarius, a legatee, < legatum, a legacy: see legacy.] One to whom a legacy is bequeathed; a legatee. [Rare.]

legate (leg'āt), n.[1] [< ME. legat, legate, < F. légat = Sp. Pg. legado = It. legato, an ambassador, esp. of the Pope, < L. legatus, a deputy, < legare, pp. legatus, send with a commission, appoint, < lex (leg-), law: see law[1]. Cf. legate, n.[2], legacy.] 1. A person commissioned to represent a state, or the highest authority in the state, in a foreign state or court; a deputy; an ambassador. Specifically—2. In Rom. hist., a foreign envoy chosen by the senate, or a lieutenant of a general or of a consul or other magistrate in the government of an army or a province.—3. One who is delegated by the Pope as his representative in the performance of certain ecclesiastical or political functions, or both. The papal legate to a church council is its presiding officer; the ordinary legate to a foreign court was formerly both ambassador to and ecclesiastical overseer of the country to which he was sent; and the legates of six of the former Papal States (see legation, 4) were their governors. Three ranks of legates were early established: legates (legati) a or de latere (from the side), who were generally cardinals; legati missi or dati (sent or given), corresponding to the modern nuncios or internuncios; and legati nati (legates born), a limited number of bishops or archbishops who had or claimed the rank of legates by right of office in their particular sees.

In this King's Time, the first Legat to supply the Pope's Room came into England. Baker, Chronicles, p. 41.

The Lord Cardinal Pole, sent here as Legate
From our most Holy Father Julius, Pope.
Tennyson, Queen Mary, iii. 3.

legate†, *n.*2 [ME. legate = Sp. legado = It. legato, < L. legatum, neut. of legatus, pp. of legare, bequeath: see legate, *n.*1, legacy.] A legacy.

In dysposyng thy legatys, pay firste thy servanntis.
Political Poems, etc. (ed. Furnivall), p. 32.

legatee (leg-ā-tē′), n. [< L. legatus, pp. of legare, bequeath (see legate, *n.*2, legacy), + *-ee*1.] One to whom a legacy is bequeathed; in the civil law, and as sometimes loosely used in both Great Britain and the United States, one to whom property, real or personal, is given by will.

legateship (leg′āt-ship), n. [< legate, *n.*1, + -ship.] The office or position of a legate.

Thus, by the chance and change of Popes, the Legatship of Anselme could take no place.
Holinshed, Hen. I., an. 1116.

legatine (leg′ā-tīn), a. [< legate, *n.*1, + *-ine*1.] 1. Of or pertaining to a legate.

Henry hereupon sent in Ambassage Iohn of Oxenford . . . to the Romane Bishop, praying that the Legatine power for England might be committed to Roger Archbishop of Yorke. Speed, Hist. of Great Britaine, ix. 458.

Sending from about them [the apostles] to all countryes their Bishops and Archbishops as their deputies, with a kind of Legantine power.
Milton, On Def. of Humb. Remonst.

2. Made by or proceeding from a legate: specifically applied to certain ecclesiastical laws enacted in national synods in England under the presidency of legates from the Pope about the time of Henry III.

When any one is absolved from excommunication, it is provided by a legatine constitution that some one shall publish such absolution. Ayliffe, Parergon.

Also legantine.

Legatine court, a court held by a papal legate, and exercising ecclesiastical jurisdiction: seen in England especially in the time of Wolsey, who as legate asserted jurisdiction as a supreme court of appeal over the spiritual courts, and jurisdiction in probate and administration, thus controlling and absorbing in a degree the functions of the courts of the Church of England.

legation (lē-gā′shon), n. [< F. légation = Sp. legación = Pg. legação = It. legazione, < L. legatio(n-), an embassy, < legatus, pp. of legare, send, depute: see legate, *n.*1.] 1. A sending forth; a commissioning of one or more persons to act at a distance for another or for others; the office or functions of a legate or envoy.

And thys busynesse was farre dyuerse from worldlye affaires; euen so was this kind of ambassade or Legatyon new, and such a one as had not bene vsed before.
J. Udall, On Mark vi.

The holy Jesus went now to eat his last paschal supper, and to finish the work of his legation.
Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), I. 301.

2. The person or persons sent to represent a government at a foreign court; an embassy; a diplomatic minister and his suite: as, the legation of the United States at Paris.—3. The place of business or the official abode of an embassy.—4. Formerly, the designation of any one of those six Papal States that were governed by cardinal legates.

The pope began his government of Ferrara, now become a legation like Bologna. Brougham.

legatissimo (lā-gä-tē′si-mō), a. and adv. In music, in the smoothest, most legato manner.

legative† (leg′ą-tiv), a. [ML. legativus, < L. legare, send: see legate.] Conferring the powers of a legate; of or pertaining to a legate.

★Shak., Hen. VIII., iii. 2. 339.

legato (lā-gä′tō), a., adv., and n. [It., pp. of legare, tie, < L. ligare, tie: see ligament.] I. a. and adv. In music, in a smooth, connected manner, without breaks or pauses between successive tones: opposed to staccato. It is usually indicated by the word itself (or its abbreviation leg.), by a sweeping curve, ⁀ or ⁔, above or below the notes to be performed without break, or (for single notes and chords in the midst of staccato passages) by the mark ‿ or ⁔ above or below.

II. n. A smooth, connected manner of performance, or a passage so performed. In singing and on wind-instruments a strict legato is produced only when more tones than one are made continuously by a single breath; on instruments with a keyboard, like the organ and the pianoforte, it is produced by holding each key until just as the next is struck; on bowed instruments it is produced by a continuous motion of the bow, either up or down.

legator (lē-gā′tor), n. [< L. legator, a testator, < legatus, pp. of legare, bequeath: see legate, *n.*2.] A testator; one who bequeaths a legacy.

A fair estate
Bequeath'd by some legator's last intent.
Dryden, Hind and Panther, ii. 375.

legatura (leg-ą-tö′rą), n. [It., = E. ligature, q. v.] In music, same as ligature.

legature† (leg′ą-tūr), n. [< legate, *n.*1, + -ure.] The office or mission of a legate.

The Parliament forbade him to usurp the privileges of his legature. Clarendon, Religion and Policy, vi.

leg-bail (leg′bāl), n. Escape from custody; flight from danger of arrest or capture. [Humorous.]

The summons and complaint were supplied by the tomahawk, while judgment was enforced by the scalping-knife, with leg-bail or a tribal warfare as a court of last resort. The Century, XXXVII. 632.

To give leg-bail, to escape from custody or arrest by absconding; hence, in general, to seek safety by flight. [Colloq.]

He has us now if he could only give us leg-bail again; and he must be in the same boat with us.
Dickens, Oliver Twist, xix.

leg-band (leg′band), n. A band secured around the leg, serving as part of the dress, and forming the only or principal covering of the leg, now worn by some Italian peasants, etc.; one of a set of bands passing diagonally around the leg below the knee and forming a defense for armed men.

leg-bone (leg′bōn), n. One of the long bones of a vertebrate's leg. In man the term 'leg' is restricted to the hind limb, but in quadrupeds it is extended to the fore limb as well. The metacarpals and metatarsals, when short, are usually included among the foot bones, but when long, as in the horse and cow, they too are called 'leg-bones.'

leg-boot (leg′bōt), n. In a harness, a horse-boot extending from the hoof to the knee, used to protect the limb.

leg-by (leg′bī), n. In cricket, a run made on a ball touching any part of the batsman's person except his hand.

lege† (lej), v. t. A Middle English aphetic form of *allege*1 and *allege*2.

legeance†, n. Same as legiance for allegiance.

legement†, n. An obsolete form of ledgment.

legem-pone† (lē′jem-pō′nē), n. [< L. legem pone, the title, in the Anglican prayer-book, of a psalm (the fifth division of Ps. cxix., which begins in the Vulgate with these words: "Legem pone mihi, Domine, viam justificationum tuarum"; A. V., "Teach me, O Lord, the way of thy statutes") appointed for the 25th day of the month. This psalm came to be associated especially with the 25th day of March, formerly the beginning of the year, and thus a general pay-day; hence the application of the phrase to "ready money," an application probably assisted by a humorous twist given to the literal translation 'lay down the law,' taken to mean 'lay down what is required,' i. e. "the needful," "the ready": L. legem, acc. of lex, law (see legal); pone, 2d pers. sing. impv. of ponere, put, place, lay: see ponent.] Ready money; cash. [Old slang.]

If legem pone comes, he is receav'd,
When Vix haud habeo is of hope bereav'd.
The Affectionate Shepheard (1594). (Halliwell.)

But in this, here is nothing to bee abated, all their speech is legem pone, or else with their ill custome they will detaine thee. G. Minshul, Essays in Prison, p. 26. (Nares.)

legend (lej′end or lē′jend), n. [< ME. legende, < OF. legende, F. légende = Sp. legenda = Pg. legenda, lenda = It. leggenda = D. G. Dan. legende = Sw. legend, a legend, < ML. legenda, f., a legend, story, esp. the lives of the saints; orig. things to be read, neut. pl. of fut. pass. part. of legere, read, = Gr. λέγειν, speak: see lecture, etc.] 1. In the early church, a selection of readings from Scripture appointed for use at divine service; later, and more especially, the chronicle or register of the lives of the saints, formerly read at matins and in the refectories of religious houses.

The Legend contained all the lessons out of Holy Writ, and the works of the fathers, read at matins.
Rock, Church of our Fathers, III. ii. 212.

2. An entertaining story, especially in early times one relating to wonders or miracles told of a saint; hence, any unauthentic and improbable or non-historical narrative handed down from early times; a tradition.

Thou shalt, whyl that thou livest, yere by yere,
The most party of thy tyme spende
In making of a glorious Legende
Of Goode Wommen, maidenes, and wives
That weren trewe in lovinge all her lives.
Chaucer, Prol. to Good Women, l. 483.

It were infinite, and indeed ridiculous, to speak of all the Miracles reported to be done by this St. Dunstan, which may be fit for a Legend, but not for a Chronicle.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 13.

This also was furthered by the Legend of Daphne, recorded by the Poets. Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 82.

3. A musical composition set to a poetical story, or intended to express such a story without words.—4. An inscription or device of any kind; particularly, the inscription on a shield or coat of arms, or the explanatory inscription on a monument or under a plan or drawing, or the inscription which accompanies a picture, whether descriptive or supposed to stand for words used by the persons represented in the picture.

The new inscription in fresh paint, Peffer and Snagsby, displacing the time-honoured and not easily to be deciphered legend, Peffer, only. Dickens, Bleak House, x.

5. In numis., the words or letters stamped on the obverse or the reverse of a coin or medal: sometimes differentiated from inscription as the reading around the circumference of a coin or medal, and sometimes as all that is inscribed excepting the name of the sovereign or other person represented.

The first fault therefore which I shall find with a modern legend is its diffusiveness; you have sometimes the whole side of a medal overrun with it.
Addison, Ancient Medals, iii.

6†. A roll; list; book.

Many tales ȝe tellen that Theologye lerneth;
And that I man made was and my name yentred
In the legende of lyf longe er I were,
Or elles vnwriten for somme wikkednesse as holywrit wytnesseth. Piers Plowman (B), x. 376.

Golden Legend, the "Aurea Legenda" of the middle ages, the most popular of all hagiological records, consisting of lives of saints and histories and descriptions of festivals. It was written by Jacobus de Voragine, Archbishop of Genoa, about the end of the thirteenth century, and is filled with fancies and inventions so extravagant as to be now universally discredited.

legend (lej′end or lē′jend), v. t. [< legend, n.] 1. To narrate or celebrate in or as in a legend.

Nor ladies wanton love, nor wand'ring knight
Legend I out in rhimes all richly dight.
Bp. Hall, Satires, i. 1.

Som of these perhaps by others are legended for great Saints. Milton, Hist. Eng., iii.

2. To furnish with an inscription; inscribe with a legend: as, "a legended tomb," Poe.

legenda (lē-jen′dą), n. pl. [L., things to be read: see legend.] Eccles., things which may be or are to be read, as distinguished from credenda, things to be believed.

Legendrian (lē-jen′dri-an), a. [< Legendre (see def.) + -ian.] Pertaining to or invented by the eminent French mathematician Adrien Marie Legendre (1752–1833).—Legendrian function. See function.—Legendrian or Legendre's symbol, a symbol, looking like a fraction in parenthesis, used in the theory of numbers. It is equal to plus or minus unity, according as the numerator is or is not a quadratic residue of the denominator. It vanishes if the numerator is divisible by the denominator.

leger1†, n. and a. An obsolete form of *ledger*1.

leger2 (lej′ėr), a. [Also ledger; < OF. legier, ligier, leger, F. léger = Sp. ligero = Pg. ligeiro = It. leggiero, light, nimble, < L. as if leviarius*, < levis, light: see levity.] 1. Light or small, as a line. See phrases below.—2†. Slight; unimportant; trivial: as, "leger performances," Bacon.—Leger line, in musical notation, a short line added above or below a staff to increase its extent temporarily to more than the usual five lines. The leger lines are numbered from the staff both upward and downward. Also called added line.—Leger space, in musical notation, a space between leger lines. The leger spaces are numbered from the staff both upward and downward. Also called added space.

legerdemain (lej″ėr-dē-mān′), n. [Early mod. E. legerdemaine, legierdemayne, leygier demaine, lieger du maine, < F. léger de main, light of hand: léger, light (see leger[2], a.); de, < L. de, of; main, < L. manus, hand: see main[3].] Sleight of hand; a deceptive performance or trick which depends on dexterity of hand; fallacious adroitness, trickery, or deception generally.

Perceiue theyr leygier demaine, wyth which they would iugle forth thir falshood and shift the trouth asyde.
Sir T. More, Works, p. 813.

He in slights and jugling feates did flow,
And of legierdemayne the mysteries did know.
Spenser, F. Q., V. ix. 13.

The gypsies were then to divide all the money that had been got that week, either by stealing linen or poultry, or by fortune-telling or legerdemain.
I. Walton, Complete Angler, p. 112.

To make it ground of accusation against a class of men that they are not patriotic is the most vulgar legerdemain of sophistry. Macaulay, Civil Disabilities of the Jews.

legerdemainist (lej′ėr-dē-mā′nist), n. [< legerdemain + -ist.] One who practises legerdemain; a juggler; a trickster.

legering†, n. [< leger[1], ledger[1], n., 4, + -ing[1].] See the quotation, and ledger[1], n., 4.

The law of legering, which is a deceit that colliers abuse the commonwealth withall in having unlawful sackes.
Greene, Discovery of Coosnage (1591).

legerity (lē-jer′i-ti), n. [< OF. legerite (F. légèreté), lightness, < leger, light: see leger[2].] Lightness; nimbleness. [Rare.]

When the mind is quicken'd, out of doubt,
The organs, though defunct and dead before,
Break up their drowsy grave, and newly move
With casted slough and fresh legerity.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 1. 23.

Λιβουρνος (Ptolemy), a sea-port in Tuscany.] I. n. 1. A fine kind of plait for bonnets and hats made in Tuscany from the straw of a peculiar variety of wheat, Triticum æstivum, thickly sown, cut green, and bleached: so named because exported from Leghorn.—2. A bonnet or hat made of this material.—3. [cap.] An important breed of the common domestic fowl, of the Spanish type, characterized by great activity and rather small size, high, serrated comb, drooping to one side in the hen, and white ear-lobes. The chief varieties are the brown (colored like black-breasted red games), and the white, dominique or cuckoo, and black Leghorns, all but the last having yellow legs and beak. The Leghorns are noted as being perhaps the most prolific layers of all poultry.

II. a. Pertaining to or brought from the city of Leghorn; also, made of or relating to Leghorn straw: as, a Leghorn bonnet or hat.—Leghorn plait, a braid of Leghorn straw, from which bonnets and hats are made. The upper joint of the stem is used.—Leghorn straw, the straw of a variety of wheat, Triticum æstivum, incorrectly called Triticum vulgare by some authors.

legiance† (lē′jans), n. [Also legeance, ligeance, liegeance, < ME. legiance, legeaunce, etc., legeans, ligaunce, etc., < OF. ligeance, ligeaunce, liegeance, ligance, etc.: see allegiance.] Same as allegiance.

God forbid, but ech were others brother,
Of one ligeance due vnto the king.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 199.

So also of a man that is abjured the realme; for notwithstanding the abjuration, he oweth the king his legeance, and remaineth within the kings protection.
M. Dalton, Country Justice (1620).

legibility (lej-i-bil′i-ti), n. [< legible: see -bility.] Capability of being read; legibleness.

His [Lamb's] badinage on his sister's handwriting was in jest. It was remarkable for its perfect legibility.
Talfourd, Memoirs of Lamb.

legible (lej′i-bl), a. [= Sp. legible = Pg. legivel, < LL. legibilis, legible, < L. legere, read: see legend.] 1. That may be read; written plainly or in intelligible characters: as, a legible manuscript.

Let me receive no more Gibberish or Hieroglyphics from you, but legible Letters. Howell, Letters, I. v. 28.

The old gate [of the convent of Mount Sinai] now built up is on the west side; there is some sign of a Greek inscription over it, but such as I believe would not be legible, if any one could come near it.
Pococke, Description of the East, I. 149.

Hence—2. That may be discovered or discerned by marks or indications.

People's opinions of themselves are legible in their countenances. Jeremy Collier.

=Syn. Readable, recognizable, plain, manifest.

legibleness (lej′i-bl-nes), n. The quality or state of being legible; legibility.

legibly (lej′i-bli), adv. In a legible manner; so as to be read without difficulty: as, a manuscript legibly written.

legier†, n. and a. See ledger[1].

legierdemaine†, n. See legerdemain.

legio (lē′ji-ō), n.; pl. legiones (lē-ji-ō′nēz). [L.: see legion.] In zoöl., a legion.

legion (lē′jon), n. [< ME. legiun, legioun, legion, < OF. legion, F. légion = Sp. legion = Pg. legião = It. legione = Gr. λεγεών, λεγιών, < L. legio(n-), a Roman legion, < legere, gather, select, = Gr. λέγειν, collect: see legend.] 1. In Rom. antiq., a body of infantry not corresponding exactly to either the regiment or the army-corps of modern times, composed of different numbers of men at different periods, from 3,000 under the kings to over 6,000 under Marius, usually combined with a considerable proportion of cavalry. The ancient legion had 300 horse, and that of Marius about 700. Each legion was divided into ten cohorts, each cohort into three maniples, and each maniple into two centuries. The great power of the Roman legion was due to its rigid discipline and its tactical formation in battle, which was so open and flexible as to enable it to meet every emergency without surprise or derangement. It thus presented a strong contrast on the one hand to the unwieldy solidity of the Greek phalanx, and on the other to the confused and undisciplined state of other armies of the time. Compare maniple.

Our legions are brim-full, our cause is ripe.
Shak., J. C., iv. 3. 215.

2. In French hist., one of numerous military bodies so called at different periods. Foreign legions were employed by the kings from medieval times. A number of them were formed during the Revolution and under the first empire, of which one was maintained till a recent period. This body, called specifically the legion, made itself famous in Algiers and in the Crimea. There were also provincial legions in the sixteenth century.

A soldier of the legion lay dying in Algiers.
Mrs. Norton, Bingen on the Rhine.

3. Any distinct military force or organization comparable to the Roman legion.

I myself beheld the King
Charge at the head of all his Table Round,
And all his legions crying Christ and him.
Tennyson, Lancelot and Elaine.

4. An extraordinary number; a great multitude.

My name is Legion: for we are many. Mark v. 9.

Where one sin has entered, legions will force their way through the same breach. Rogers.

5. In zoöl., a large group or series of animals, of indeterminate taxonomic rank, but generally of high grade. In Haeckel's system, for example, the legion intervenes between the subclass and the order, and corresponds to what is usually called a superorder.—Legion of Honor, in France, an order of distinction and reward for civil and military services, instituted in May, 1802, during the consulate, by Napoleon Bonaparte, but since modified from time to time in important particulars. Under the first empire the distinctions conferred invested the person decorated with the rank of legionary, officer, commander, grand-officer, or grand-cross. The order holds considerable property, the proceeds of which are paid out in pensions, principally to wounded and disabled members.—The Thundering Legion, in Christian tradition, the name given to a legion of Christians in the army of Marcus Aurelius, in battle with the Quadi, whose prayers for rain were answered, according to the tradition, by a thunder-shower, which refreshed the thirsty Romans, while it destroyed numbers of the enemy by lightning.

legion (lē′jon), v. t. [< legion, n.] To enroll or form into a legion.

We met the vultures, legioned in the air,
Stemming the torrent of the tainted wind.
Shelley, Hellas.

legionary (lē′jon-ā-ri), a. and n. [= F. légionnaire = Sp. Pg. It. legionario, < L. legionarius, belonging to a legion, < legio(n-), a Roman legion: see legion.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or consisting of a legion or legions: as, legionary discipline; a legionary soldier; a legionary force.—2. Containing a great number.

Too many applying themselves betwixt jest and earnest make up the legionary body of errour. Sir T. Browne.

II. n.; pl. legionaries (-riz). 1. One of a legion; especially, a Roman soldier belonging to a legion or a subaltern member of the Legion of Honor.—2. The neuter of a kind of red ant so named by Huber. It is probably the neuter of Polyergus rufescens, a slave-making species.

legiones, n. Plural of legio.

legionize (lē′jon-īz), v. t.; pret. and pp. legionized, ppr. legionizing. [< legion + -ize.] To form in a legion.

Descend, sweet Angels, legioniz'd in rankes.
Davies, Holy Roode, p. 28.

leg-iron (leg′ī″ėrn), n. 1. A fetter for the leg. Dickens, Great Expectations, xvi.—2. In carbuilding, a wrought-iron forging supporting the foot-boards. [Eng.]

legislate (lej′is-lāt), v.; pret. and pp. legislated, ppr. legislating. [A back formation (like Pg. legislar) from legislator, legislation, etc., q. v.] I. intrans. To exercise the function of legislation; make or enact a law or laws.

II. trans. To act upon or effect by means of legislation; determine by enactment: as, to legislate a man out of office (as by abolishing the office or changing its tenure); to legislate a ★corporation into existence. [U. S.]

legislation (lej-is-lā′shon), n. [= F. législation = Sp. legislación = Pg. legislação = It. legislazione, < L. legis latio(n-), a proposing of a law: legis, gen. of lex, law (see legal); latio(n-), a bearing, proposing: see lation.] 1. The enacting of laws or statutes; the exercise of the power of legislating; the business of a legislator or a legislature.—2. The product of legislative action; a law or the laws promulgated by a legislator or a legislature; a statute, or a body of statutory law: as, the legislation of Moses is contained in the Pentateuch.—Class legislation, that legislation which affects the interests of a particular class of persons.—General legislation, that legislation which is applicable throughout the state generally, as distinguished from special legislation, which affects only particular persons or localities.—Local legislation. See local.

legislative (lej′is-lā-tiv), a. and n. [= F. législatif = Sp. Pg. It. legislativo; as legislate + -ive.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or resulting from legislation; ordained by a legislator or a legislature; having statutory force or quality: as, legislative proceedings; a legislative prohibition.

The poet is a kind of lawgiver, and those qualities are proper to the legislative style. Dryden.

2. Having power to legislate; enacting or uttering laws; lawmaking: as, a legislative body; legislative authority.—3. Of or belonging to a legislature; relating to or consisting of a body of legislators: as, a legislative committee; a legislative vote; a legislative recess.—Legislative Assembly. See assembly.—Legislative power, the power to make or alter laws. See judicial power (under judicial), and executive, 1.

II. n. A person, as a prince or dictator, or a body of persons, as a parliamentary assembly, invested with authority to make or alter laws. Compare executive.

The power of the legislative, being derived from the people by a positive voluntary grant and institution, can be no other than what that positive grant conveyed, which being only to make laws and not to make legislators, the legislative can have no power to transfer their authority of making laws, and place it in other hands.
Locke, Civil Government, xi.

legislatively (lej'is-lā-tiv-li), adv. By legislative action; by means of legislation.

legislator (lej'is-lā-tor), n. [= F. législateur = Sp. Pg. legislador = It. legislatore, < L. legis lator (also legum lator), a lawgiver: legis, gen., legum, gen. pl., of lex, law (see legal); lator, a bearer, proposer of a law, < latus, used as pp. of ferre = E. bear[1]. Cf. legislation.] A lawgiver; an individual who gives or makes laws; also, a member of a legislature or parliament, or other lawmaking body.

legislatorial (lej″is-lā-tō'ri-al), a. [< legislator + -ial.] 1. Pertaining or relating to legislation or legislators: as, legislatorial power or dictation.—2. Having the power of a legislator; acting as a legislator or legislature.

Solon, the legislatorial founder of Athens.
De Quincey, Homer, ii.

One may imagine a community governed by a dependent legislatorial body. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 357.

legislatorship (lej'is-lā-tor-ship), n. [< legislator + -ship.] The office of legislator.

legislatress (lej'is-lā-tres), n. [< legislator + -ess.] A woman who makes laws; a female legislator. Shaftesbury, Morals, iv. § 2.

legislatrix (lej-is-lā'triks), n. [= F. législatrice, < L. as if legis latrix*, fem. of legis lator, legislator: see legislator.] Same as legislatress.

legislature (lej'is-lā-tūr), n. [= F. législature = Sp. Pg. It. legislatura, legislature, < L. legis, gen. of lex, law, + (LL.) latura, a bearing, carrying, < latus, pp. of ferre = E. bear[1]: see legislator.] 1. A body of lawmakers; an assemblage of men invested with the power of making, repealing, or changing the laws of a country or state, and of raising and appropriating its revenues. A legislature generally consists of two houses or separate bodies acting concurrently, and usually requires the assent of the supreme executive authority for the validation of its acts, the refusal of which, however, may in the United States be overcome by a prescribed majority of votes. (See veto.) Legislatures have different specific names, as the Congress of the United States and the Legislatures of most of the separate States (the former consisting of a Senate and House of Representatives, and the two houses of the latter being generally also termed Senate and House of Representatives or Assembly), the Parliament of Great Britain (divided into the House of Lords and the House of Commons), the Reichstag of Germany, the Cortes of Spain, etc. See house[1], n., 6.

In the legislature, the people are a check on the nobility, and the nobility a check upon the people.
Blackstone, Com., I. ii.

'Twas April, as the bumpkins say;
The legislature call'd it May. Cowper, A Fable.

2. Any body of persons authorized to make laws or rules for the community represented by them: as, the General Assembly is the legislature of the Presbyterian Church.

legist (lē'jist), n. [< OF. legiste, F. légiste = Sp. Pg. It. legista, < ML. legista, one skilled in law, < L. lex (leg-), law: see legal. Cf. legister.] One skilled in the laws.

Though there should be emulation between them, yet as legists they will agree in magnifying that wherein they are best. Bacon, Letters, cxxvii., To the King.

Ye learned legists of contentious law.
Ford, Fame's Memorial.

legister†, n. [ME., also legistre, legester, < OF. legistre, equiv. to legiste, legist: see legist.] A legist.

Bisshopes yblessed gif thei ben as thei shulden,
Legistres of bothe the lawes, the lewed there-with to preche.
Piers Plowman (B), vii. 14.

legitim, n. See legitime.

legitimacy (lē-jit'i-mā-si), n. [< legitima(te) + -cy.] 1. The state of being legitimate; conformity to law, rule, or principle; natural or logical result; regularity; propriety; correctness: as, the legitimacy of a government, of an argument, or of a conclusion.

During his first ten years of duty Beust served in Berlin and Paris; the first, the stronghold of legitimacy, more conservative than Vienna itself; the second, the center of fashion and culture, where the salon had not yet become extinct. Quarterly Rev., CXLV. 330.

Specifically—2. Lawfulness of birth: opposed to bastardy.—3. Directness or regularity of descent, as affecting the right of succession. See legitimist, 2.

legitimate (lē-jit'i-māt), v. t.; pret. and pp. legitimated, ppr. legitimating. [< ML. legitimatus, pp. of legitimare (> It. legitimare = Pg. Sp. legitimar = F. légitimer), make lawful, < L. legitimus, lawful: see legitime.] 1. To make lawful; establish the legitimacy or propriety of.

Our blessed Lord was pleased to legitimate fear to us by his agony and prayers in the garden.
Jer. Taylor, Holy Dying, iii. 8.

To enact a statute of that which he dares not seem to approve, even to legitimate vice. Milton, Divorce, ii. 2.

The general voice has legitimated this objection.
Jefferson, Correspondence, II. 450.

2. To render legitimate, as a bastard; invest with the rights of a legitimate child or lawful heir, as one born out of wedlock. Under the civil and canon laws operative in many European countries a bastard is legitimated by the subsequent marriage of the parents; but this is not the case under the laws of England and most of the United States.

At this Time, in a Parliament, the Duke of Lancaster caused to be legitimated the Issue he had by Katherine Swinford before he married her.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 147.

★ legitimate (lē-jit'i-māt), a. [< ML. legitimatus, pp. of legitimare, make lawful: see the verb.] 1. According to law, rule, or precedent; agreeable to established principles or standards; in conformity with custom or usage; lawful; regular; orderly; proper: as, a legitimate king or government; the legitimate drama; a legitimate subject of debate; legitimate trade.

There are certain themes . . . which are too entirely horrible for legitimate fiction. Poe, Tales, I. 325.

Among the topics of literary speculation, there is none more legitimate or more interesting than to consider who, among the writers of a given age, are elected to live.
Gladstone, Might of Right, p. 123.

Specifically—2. Of lawful birth; born in wedlock, or of parents legally married: as, legitimate children; a legitimate heir.

Sirrah, your brother is legitimate;
Your father's wife did after wedlock bear him.
Shak., K. John, i. 1. 116.

A legitimate child is one born of wedlock; or, more particularly, one between whose parents the relation of marriage subsisted either at the time when he was begotten, or at the time when he was born, or at some intervening period. Stephen, 2 Com., 283.

3. Justly based on the premises; logically correct, allowable, or valid: as, a legitimate result; legitimate arguments or conclusion.

I will prove it [an assertion] legitimate, sir, upon the oaths of judgement and reason.
Shak., Twelfth Night, iii. 2. 16.

A series of legitimate syllogisms, exhibiting separately and distinctly, in a light as clear and strong as language can afford, each successive link of the demonstration.
D. Stewart, Human Mind, II. iii. 1.

It is just as legitimate an inference that there are bodies in stellar space not luminous as that there are luminous bodies in space not visible.
J. Croll, Climate and Cosmology, p. 310.

Legitimate drama, a designation used at different periods with a varying specific reference, being sometimes applied to the representation of Shakspere's plays and at other times otherwise restricted, but generally employed loosely to indicate approval of some (usually not distant) former time.—Legitimate prejudice, an innate or a priori presumption and anticipation of nature.=Syn. Legal, Licit, etc. See lawful.

legitimately (lē-jit'i-māt-li), adv. In a legitimate manner; lawfully; according to law; genuinely; not falsely.

legitimateness (lē-jit'i-māt-nes), n. The state or quality of being legitimate; legality; lawfulness; genuineness.

Asserting the legitimateness of his ordination.
Barrow, Pope's Supremacy.

legitimation (lē-jit-i-mā'shon), n. [= F. légitimation = Sp. legitimación = Pg. legitimação = It. legittimazione, legittimagione, < ML. as if legitimatio(n-)*, < legitimare, legitimate: see legitimate, v.] 1. The act of making legal, or of giving a thing the recognition of law.

The coinage or legitimation of money. East.

2. The act of rendering legitimate; specifically, the investing of an illegitimate child, or one supposed to be the issue of an illegal marriage, with the rights of one born in lawful wedlock.

This doubt was kept long open, in respect of the two queens that succeeded, Mary and Elizabeth, whose legitimations were incompatible one with another, though their succession was settled by act of parliament.
Bacon, Hist. Hen. VII. (ed. Bohn), p. 452.

I have disclaim'd Sir Robert and my land;
Legitimation, name, and all is gone;
Then, good my mother, let me know my father.
Shak., K. John, i. 1. 248.

3. In Germany, etc., proof of identity and of legal permission to reside in a certain place, engage in a certain occupation, etc.—Letters of legitimation, in Scots law, letters from the sovereign empowering a bastard who has no lawful children to dispose of his heritage or movables at any time during his life, and to make a testament. These privileges, however, he can now enjoy without letters of legitimation.

legitimatist (lē-jit'i-mā-tist), n. [< legitimate, a., + -ist.] Same as legitimist.

legitimatize (lē-jit'i-mā-tīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. legitimatized, ppr. legitimatizing. [< legitimate + -ize.] To legitimate. [Rare.]

A Governor-General of the Soudan . . . who legitimatizes the slave-trade by a decree. The Century, XXVIII. 561.

★ legitime (lej'i-tim), n. [< F. légitime = Sp. legítimo = Pg. legitimo = It. legittimo, < L. legitimus, according to law, legal, legitimate, < lex (leg-), law: see legal.] In civil law, the part of the free movable property of a testator which he cannot bequeath away from his children, or deprive them of inheriting by making gifts while living. The one fourth which was thus secured to the children by the Roman law was termed the Falcidian portion, the law being named after the tribune Falcidius, who proposed it. This principle has been adopted in varying extent in some of the principal countries of Europe, including Scotland, and also in Louisiana. In Scots law the legitime (commonly spelled legitim), also called bairns' part of gear (the part which the testator may freely dispose of being termed the dead's part), amounts to one third where the father has left a widow, and one half where there is no widow. It cannot be diminished or affected by any testamentary or other deed.

legitimisation, legitimise. See legitimization, legitimize.

legitimism (lē-jit'i-mizm), n. [< F. légitimisme, < L. legitimus, legitimate: see legitime and -ism.] Maintenance of or insistence upon legitimacy in any relation; specifically, the principles of the Legitimists.

The theory of sovereignty and government called legitimism, which is still a factor in French and Spanish politics, is ultimately based on the assumption of a sort of sacred and indefeasible law regulating succession to the Crown, and placing it beyond competition and above popular sanction. Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 143.

legitimist (lē-jit'i-mist), n. [< F. légitimiste = Sp. legitimista, < L. legitimus, legitimate: see legitime and -ist.] 1. One who maintains or advocates legitimacy of any kind; especially, a supporter of legitimate authority; one who believes in the sacredness of hereditary monarchical government; a favorer of the doctrine of divine right. Specifically—2. [cap.] (a) In France, a supporter of the claim to the throne of the elder branch of the Bourbons, descendants of Louis XIV., in opposition to that of the Orleans family, descendants of the Duke of Orleans, brother of Louis XIV. Charles X., the representative of the elder line, was deposed in 1830, and replaced by Louis Philippe, of the younger line. The succession fell into abeyance after the deposition of the latter in 1848, and the dispute was terminated in 1883 by the death of the childless Comte de Chambord (who was actually invested with the crown at the age of ten by the abdication of his grandfather, Charles X., and of the dauphin, the Duc d'Angoulême, and was called by his adherents Henry V.), leaving the Comte de Paris, grandson of Louis Philippe, sole heir to the royal claims of the whole Bourbon family. (b) In Spain, same as Carlist, 2.

legitimization (lē-jit″i-mi-zā'shon), n. [< legitimize + -ation.] Legitimation. Also spelled legitimisation.

The conflict of laws on the subject of legitimization by subsequent marriage yields some curious results.
Encyc. Brit., III. 427.

legitimize (lē-jit'i-mīz), v. t.; pret. and pp. legitimized, ppr. legitimizing. [< L. legitimus, legitimate (see legitimate), + -ize.] To legitimate. Also spelled legitimise.

legless (leg'les), a. [< leg + -less.] Having no legs.

leglet (leg'let), n. [< leg + -let.] An ornament for the leg, of the same nature as the anklet.

Her [the Begum of Oude's] dress was an immense pair of trousers of striped Indian silk, a Cashmere shawl . . . over a close covering of blue and yellow silk, two pairs of remarkable slippers, numbers of anklets and leglets, a great deal of jewelry, and a large blue cloak over all.
Caroline Fox, Journal, p. 11.

leglin (leg'lin), n. [Appar. for legling*, dim. of legel*, < Icel. legill = Sw. lägel = OHG. lagila, lagella, MHG. lægele, lægel, lagel, G. legel, lägel, a small cask, < L. lagena, a flagon: see lagena.] A wooden milk-pail. [Scotch.]

The lasses are lonely, dowie, and wae; . . .
Ilk ane lifts her leglin, and hies her away.
Jane Elliot, Flowers of the Forest.

leg-lock (leg'lok), n. A lock or fetter for the leg.

leg-muff (leg'muf), n. One of the fleecy or downy puffs or tufts about the feet of many humming-birds; a fluffy legging. See cut under Eriocnemis.

Legnotideæ (leg-nō-tid'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bartling, 1830), ‹ Legnotis (-id-), a former genus of plants now referred to Cassipourea (‹ Gr. λεγνωτός, with a colored border, ‹ λέγνον, a hem, border, esp. a colored border), + -eæ.] In the system of Bentham and Hooker, a tribe of the family Rhizophoraceæ, embracing all but two of the genera. It is practically equivalent to the two tribes Gynotrocheæ and Macarisieæ of Engler and Prantl. Not being based on any recognized genus it should be abandoned.

lego-literary (lē″gō-lit'e-rā-ri), a. [‹ L. lex (leg-), law (see legal), + E. literary, q. v.] Pertaining to the literature of law. [Rare and barbarous.]

An essay on this lego-literary subject. Lord Campbell.

leg-rest (leg'rest), n. A rest or support for the leg.

Tom advanced before him, carrying the leg-rest.
George Eliot, Mill on the Floss, iii. 8.

leg-shield (leg'shēld), n. A defensive appliance formerly used to protect the leg of a juster: sometimes attached to the saddle, sometimes to the poitrel of the horse, and sometimes forming a separate shield-shaped plate of iron. This shield, of whatever form, was worn particularly to guard the left leg, because this side was especially liable to injury by striking against the barrier which separated the justing knights. The first of the three forms was also used in war.

Leguatia (leg-ū-ā'ti-ạ), n. [NL., named after F. Leguat.] A genus of large ralliform birds of the Mascarene Islands, recently extinct; the giant rails. L. gigantea, a species about 6 feet tall, was described by Leguat. H. Schlegel, 1858.

leguleian (leg-ū-lē'yan), a. and n. [‹ L. leguleius, a pettifogging lawyer, with dim. -ul-, ‹ lex (leg-), law: see legal.] I. a. Pettifogging. [Rare.]

In the classical English sense, or in the sense of leguleian barbarism. De Quincey.

II. n. A pettifogger. [Rare.]

You do but that over again that you have from the very beginning of your Discourse, and which some silly Leguleians now and then do, to argue unawares against their own Clients. Milton, Answer to Salmasius.

legume (leg'ūm or lē-gūm'), n. [‹ F. légume = Sp. legumbre = Pg. It. legume, pulse, ‹ L. legumen, any leguminous plant, pulse, esp. the bean, lit. 'that which may be gathered,' ‹ legere, gather: see legend.] 1. pl. The fruit of leguminous plants of the pea kind; pulse.

Legumes, or Legumens, are a species of plants which are call'd pulse, such as pease, beans, &c., and are so call'd because they may be gather'd by the hand without cutting. Miller, Gardener's Dict.

2. A pod formed of a simple pistil, which is dehiscent by both sutures and so divides into two valves, the seeds being borne at the inner or ventral suture only. The name is confined to the fruit of the Leguminosæ. In the modification of the legume called a loment the pod breaks up into indehiscent joints. See cut under loment.

legumen (lē-gū'men), n. [L.: see legume.] Same as legume.

legumin (lē-gū'min), n. [‹ legume + *-in*².] A nitrogenous protein substance resembling casein, obtained from peas and other legumes. It is insoluble in water or acid, but is freely soluble in very dilute alkali, and has an acid reaction. Also called vegetable casein.

leguminar (lē-gū'mi-nạr), a. In bot., resembling or characteristic of a legume: said of dehiscence by a marginal suture.

leguminiform (leg-ū-min'i-fôrm), a. [‹ L. legumen, legume, + forma, form.] Having the form of a legume.

Leguminosæ (lē-gū-mi-nō'sē), n. pl. [NL. (P. S. Ralph, 1849), fem. pl. of leguminosus, leguminous: see leguminous.] A large family of dicotyledonous archichlamydeous choripetalous plants, exceeded in the number of species by the Compositæ only, belonging to the order Rosales. It is characterized, in brief, by the generally papilionaceous but sometimes regular flowers, and a single free pistil that forms a fruit known as a legume. The leaves are, with rare exceptions, alternate, compound, and generally pinnate. The family is composed of trees, shrubs, and herbs, distributed throughout the world, except the frigid islands of the antarctic region. It is usually divided into three subfamilies, known as the Papilionaceæ, Cæsalpiniæ, and Mimoseæ. The modern tendency is to treat these as distinct families, the Fabaceæ, Cæsalpiniaceæ, and Mimosaceæ, respectively. The names Leguminosæ and Papilionaceæ, not being formed from names of genera, are discontinued under the rules of nomenclature. The former, however, remains a convenient designation for leguminous plants in general.

leguminose (lē-gū'mi-nōs), a. [‹ NL. leguminosus: see leguminous.] Same as leguminous.

leguminous (lē-gū'mi-nus), a. [= F. légumineux = Sp. Pg. It. leguminoso, ‹ NL. leguminosus, pertaining to pulse, bearing legumes, ‹ L. legumen (legumin-), pulse, bean, NL. legume: see legume.] 1. Pertaining to pulse; consisting of pulse.—2. In bot., bearing legumes as seed-vessels; pertaining to plants which bear legumes, as peas; specifically, of or pertaining to the Leguminosæ.

Also leguminose.

(b) A Megaric sophism depending on the question whether a man who says "I am lying" is truly lying or not.—2. In math., a proposition upon which it is necessary to arrest the attention for the sake of proving an ulterior one, but which interrupts the regular series of theorems; also, a premise drawn from another branch of mathematics than that under consideration.—3. A theme; a thesis; the subject of an epigram, or of a musical composition, etc. [A Latinism.]

In the year 1445, several pageants were exhibited at Paul's-gate, with verses written by Lydgate on the following lemmata: . . . Five wise and five foolish virgins, Of St. Margaret, etc.
T. Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry, III. 158, note.

4. In embryol., the primary or outer layer of the germinal vesicle. Pascoe. = Syn. See inference.

lemmergeyer, n. See lammergeier.

lemming, leming (lem′ing), n. [< Norw. lemming, also lemende, limende = Sw. lemming = Dan. lemming, a lemming, according to Aasen lit. 'destroying,' with ref. to its ravages, < Norw. lemja, maim, strike, beat, = E. lame[1], v.; but the variations of form indicate a foreign origin, perhaps Lappish: cf. Lapp. loumek, a lemming. Hence NL. Lemmus.] A rodent quadruped of the family Muridæ, subfamily Microtinæ, and one of the genera Myodes, Cuniculus, and Synaptomys (see these terms). The common European lemming, Mus lemmus of Linnæus, now Lemmus lemmus, to which alone the name originally pertained, inhabits Norway, Sweden, and Lapland. It is about 5 inches long, of a tawny color mottled with black, and very prolific. At irregular intervals hordes of lemmings descend from the mountains and move toward the coasts, proceeding in a straight line, crossing lakes and rivers and devastating the country along their line of march. They are preyed upon by hawks, owls, weasels, and foxes; multitudes are drowned; and few return to their native haunts. An unusual increase in numbers, followed by a deficiency in food supply, is believed to be the cause for these movements. L. obensis is a rusty brown species inhabiting eastern Siberia, while the closely related L. alascensis is found in Alaska. The lemming of the Hudson Bay region is Dicrostonyx torquatus, a species which turns white in winter. A small true lemming, Synaptomys cooperi, resembling a field-mouse in external appearance, is found in the United States from eastern Massachusetts to Minnesota and south to the mountains of North Carolina; it also occurs in British America.

Common European or Norway Lemming (Lemmus lemmus).

Lemmus (lem′us), n. [NL., orig. a technical designation of the Norway lemming: see lemming.] A genus of Muridæ, subfamily Microtinæ, including the lemmings.

Lemna (lem′nä), n. [NL. (Linnæus), < Gr. λέμνα, a water-plant.] A genus of monocotyledonous plants, type of the family Lemnaceæ. It is distinguished from Wolffia, and other genera of the family, by having the flowers developed on the margin of the frond instead of from a pit in the upper surface. Distributed about the temperate and tropical regions of the world are seven species, known as duckweed, some of them the smallest of flowering plants, consisting of a frond that floats on the surface of the water, and bears below a few thread-like roots, and above one or more monœcious flowers.

1. Lemna minor, flowering plant; a, inflorescence; b, pistil cut longitudinally; c, fruit. 2. Lemna trisulca. 3. Lemna gibba.

Lemnaceæ (lem-nā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Dumortier, 1827), < Lemna + -aceæ.] A family of monocotyledonous water-plants, the duckweed family, distinguished by the absence of a distinct stem or foliage, and producing one or a few monœcious or dicœcious flowers from the edge or upper surface of the frond. There are 4 genera, of which Spirodela, Lemna, and Wolffia are generally distributed throughout the temperate and tropical regions of the world.

lemnad (lem′nad), n. [< NL. Lemna + -ad[1].] A plant of the family Lemnaceæ; a duckweed: used in the plural by Lindley for the Lemnaceæ, or duckweed family.

Lemnian (lem′ni-an), a. [< L. Lemnius (< Gr. Λήμνιος), Lemnian, < Lemnos, Lemnus, < Gr. Λῆμνος, Lemnos, an island in the Ægean sea.] Of or pertaining to Lemnos, an island in the Ægean sea.—Lemnian earth, a kind of astringent earth, of fatty consistence and reddish color, used medicinally in the same cases as the other boles. It has the external appearance of clay, with a smooth surface resembling agate, especially in recent fractures. Like soap, it removes impurities. Like kaolin, to which it is related, it has its origin in the decomposition of feldspathic rocks. See bole[2].—Lemnian ruddle, a sort of red chalk obtained from deposits in Lemnos, and used as a coloring material.

lemniscate (lem-nis′kāt), a. and n. [< NL. lemniscata, fem. of L. lemniscatus, adorned with pendent ribbons, < lemniscus, a ribbon: see lemniscus.] I. a. 1. In math., related to the lemniscate of Bernoulli.—2. In ichth., having a hyaline or transparent appearance and ribbon-like form; of or relating to the Lemniscati: as, a lemniscate fish.—Lemniscate function, the function of which the lemniscate integral is the inverse.—Lemniscate integral, the elliptic integral which is exhibited in the quincuncial projection of the sphere.

$$\int \frac{dx}{\sqrt{1-x^4}}$$

II. n. In math.: (a) The locus of the point at which the tangent to an equilateral hyperbola meets the perpendicular let fall upon it from the center: a curve invented by James Bernoulli. It may also be defined as the locus of the point the product of whose distances from two fixed points is a quarter of the square of the distance of those points from each other. It is a kind of Cassinian, and is also a lemniscate in sense (c), below. (b) Any crunodal curve of the fourth order having only one real branch, and this finite and symmetrical with respect to two axes. [This definition is an attempt to interpret that of certain writers formerly in repute, who say that the lemniscate has the shape of an 8, but who give as the typical form a curve which, having a tacnodal acnode at infinity, is not a bicircular quartic. Curves satisfying this definition are of the 10th, 8th, and 6th classes. See figures and Cassinian.] (c) The locus of the point at which the tangent to a fixed conic is cut by a perpendicular let fall upon it from the center.

Lemniscates.

Its equation is $(x^2+y^2)^2=ax^2+by^2$. It is a unicursal bicircular quartic. (See bicircular.) It has two real and two imaginary bitangents represented by the equation

It is called an elliptic or hyperbolic lemniscate, according as the fixed conic is an ellipse or a hyperbola; in the former case the central node is an acnode, in the latter a crunode. See the figure. (d) A Cassinian: a misapplication of the word originating in Germany.

Elliptic Lemniscate.

Lemniscati (lem-nis-kā′tī), n. pl. [NL., < L. lemniscatus, adorned with pendent ribbons: see lemniscate.] A group of fishes of ribbon-like form and hyaline appearance, containing the Leptocephalidæ and similar forms, now known to be the larval stages or young of other fishes.

lemniscatic (lem-nis-kat′ik), a. [< lemniscate + -ic.] Of or concerning lemniscates.—Lemniscatic coördinates, a system of confocal Cassinians cut orthogonally by equilateral hyperbolas and used as coördinates. See lemniscatic geometry.—Lemniscatic curve. See curve and lemniscate (b).—Lemniscatic geometry, the geometry of Cassinians. Any conform map-projection which shows every point of the globe twice (except the one thrown to infinity), and on a single sheet, transforms all circles into bicircular quartics, thus affording an easy way of studying the latter curves. If the point thrown to infinity is one of the poles, the parallels of latitude appear as Cassinians, while the meridians become equilateral hyperbolas.

lemniscus (lem-nis′kus), n.; pl. lemnisci (-ī). [L., a pendent ribbon, < Gr. λημνίσκος, a woolen fillet or band; with irreg. inserted μ and dim. term. -ίσκος, < λῆνος = L. lana, wool.] 1. In anc. costume, a woolen fillet or ribbon pendent at the back of the head from diadems, crowns, etc. It was likewise attached to prizes as a mark of additional honor.—2. In anat.: (a) One of the minute ribbon-like appendages of the generative pores of some entozoans, as Echinorhynchus. See cut under Acanthocephala.

The cavity of the body [of Echinorhynchus] is filled with a fluid, in which the ova, or spermatozoa, float, and, at its anterior extremity, two elongated oval bodies depend from the parietes, and hang freely in it. These are the lemnisci.
Huxley, Anat. Invert., p. 554.

(b) Same as fillet, 9.—3. [cap.] In zoöl., a genus of acalephs. Quoy and Gaimard, 1824.

Lemodipoda (lem-ō-dip′ō-dä), n. pl. See Læmodipoda.

lemon (lem′on), n. and a. [Formerly also lemmon, limon, lemond; = D. limoen = G. limone = Dan. Sw. lemon, limon, < F. limon = Sp. limón = Pg. limão = It. limone, < ML. limo(n-) (also lemonium), NL. limonum = NGr. λειμῶνι = Russ. limonŭ = Bulg. limon = Serv. limun = Hung. lemonya = Turk. līmūn = Hind. nībū, nīnbū, nimbū = Pers. līmūn, līmūnā, also līmū, < Ar. līmūn, a lemon. Cf. lime[5], from the same ult. source.]

I. n. 1. The fruit of the rutaceous tree Citrus Limon. It is botanically a berry of an ellipsoid form, knobbed at the apex, with a pale-yellow rind whose outer layer is charged with a fragrant oil, and a light-colored pulp, full of an acid well-flavored juice. The latter, together with lime-juice, is the chief commercial source of citric acid. The oil or essence of lemons is extracted from the rind, at present by the method of expression, which yields the best. It is consumed in large quantities as a flavoring essence and a component of perfumes.

A fruit that the inhabitants call Maracocks, which is a pleasant wholesome fruit much like a Lemond.
Capt. John Smith, Works, I. 123.

I'll be with you in the squeezing of a lemon.
Goldsmith, She Stoops to Conquer, i. 1.

2. The tree that yields this fruit. It is found wild in the mountainous regions of India, especially in the north. As a cultivated fruit-tree, it was early known and disseminated by the Arabs, but appears not to have been established in Europe till comparatively late, perhaps brought by the crusaders. It is now cultivated widely in subtropical countries, and is grown industrially in Italy and the adjacent islands, in Spain and Portugal, and in California and Florida, generally in connection with the orange. The common lemon is a tree from 10 to 15 feet high. Unlike the orange, it is of irregular growth and of sparse foliage. The corolla of its flowers is purplish on the outside. Its closest botanical affinity is with the citron, the two being now considered as varieties of the same species. See Citrus, 2.

Far off, and where the lemon grove
In closest coverture upsprung,
The living airs of middle night
Died round the bulbul as he sung.
Tennyson, Arabian Nights.

3. The borhame or sand-sole, a kind of flatfish. See lemon-sole, 1.—Bergamot lemon. Same as bergamot[1], 1.—Essential salt of lemon, the binoxalate of potash, or potash combined with oxalic acid, used for removing iron-mold and ink-stains from linen.—Fingered lemon, an odd Chinese variety of lemon with very little pulp, in which the segments divide at the apex into five or more cylindrical lobes.—Sea lemon. See sea-lemon.—Sweet lemon, pear lemon, a variety of Citrus Limon, a somewhat pear-shaped fruit. The variety also includes the sweet lime. They lack the acidity of the common lemon.—Water lemon. See water-lemon.

II. a. 1. Having lemon as a principal ingredient; impregnated or flavored with lemon: as, lemon candy.

He made our Skins as smooth as a Fair Ladies Cheeks, just wash'd with Lemon Posset, and greas'd over with Pomatum.
Quoted in Ashton's Social Life in Reign of Queen Anne, [II. 116.

2. Of the color of a lemon; lemon-colored: as, lemon silk.

lemonade (lem-ọ-nād′), n. [< F. limonade (= Sp. limonada = Pg. limonada, limoada = It. limonata, limonea, > Ar. līmūnada), < limon, lemon: see lemon and -ade[1].] A beverage consisting of lemon-juice mixed with water and sweetened.

A Persian's heaven is eas'ly made,
'Tis but black eyes and lemonade.
Moore, Intercepted Letters, vi.

lemon-balm (lem′on-bäm), n. A garden-herb, Melissa officinalis. See balm, 7, and Melissa.

lemon-bird (lem′on-bėrd), n. The common linnet, Linota cannabina: from the yellowish coloration of the male. [West Riding, Eng.]

lemon-cadmium (lem′on-kad″mi-um), n. A very pale shade of cadmium-yellow.

lemon-color (lem′on-kul″or), n. A yellow resembling the color of a ripe lemon; any proper yellow of a greener tint than gamboge, but not so much so as to suggest the idea of green.

lemon-colored (lem′on-kul″ord), a. Having the color of a ripe lemon; of a lemon-color.

lemon-dab (lem′on-dab), n. The smear-dab. [Local, Irish.]

lemon-drop (lem′on-drop), n. A kind of candy in drops, flavored with lemon-juice or oil of lemon.

lemon-fish (lem′on-fish), n. A species of amber-fish, Seriola zonata, of the Gulf of Mexico. [Louisiana.]

lemon-grass (lem′on-gras), n. A sweet-scented East Indian grass, Andropogon schœnanthus. It is abundant wild and in cultivation in India, and is known in Western greenhouses. An infusion of its leaves is used as a tea, and is considered a good stomachic. The name lemon-grass is also given to A. Nardus and perhaps to other fragrant species of the genus.—Lemon-grass oil, an oil distilled from the leaves of Andropogon schœnanthus. Chiefly sought as a perfume, for which use it is exported from Ceylon and elsewhere in large quantities. It resembles oil of verbena, under which name it often passes. It is more or less confounded with citronella-oil, from a related grass. See Andropogon and citronella.

Lemonias (lē-mō′ni-as), n. [NL., < Gr. λειμωνιάς, a meadow-nymph, < λειμών, a meadow.] The typical genus of Lemoniinæ, of which the Linnean Papilio lemonias is the type.

Lemoniidæ (lem-ọ-nī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lemonias + -idæ.] A family of butterflies: also called Eryciniidæ. They are characterized by the male having but four perfect feet, and are divided into four subfamilies, Lemoniinæ, Euselasiinæ, Nemeobiinæ, and Libythæinæ.

lemon-juice (lem′on-jōs), n. The juice of the lemon. It is somewhat opaque and turbid and extremely sour, owing its acidity to citric and malic acids. It is much used, especially in the form of lemonade, or combined with potassium bicarbonate, as a cooling and effervescing beverage. Among seamen it is highly esteemed as an antiscorbutic.

lemon-kali (lem′on-kā″lī), n. A mixture of potassium bicarbonate with lemon-juice. (a) In the form of a powder, the bicarbonate strongly flavored with lemon. (b) An effervescing drink made either by dissolving the powder or by mixing the ingredients fresh. Also lemon and kali.

lemon-scented (lem′on-sent″ed), a. Scented with lemon, or having a fragrance similar to that of lemon.—Lemon-scented thyme. See lemon-thyme.—Lemon-scented verbena. See lemon-verbena.

lemon-sole (lem′on-sōl), n. 1. A fish of the family Soleidæ, Solea lascaris.—2. The smear-dab, Hippoglossoides limandoides. [Scotch.] Also lemon-dab.

lemon-squash (lem′on-skwosh), n. Lemonade. [Eng.]

lemon-squeezer (lem′on-skwē″zėr), n. A small hand-press, usually of the lever type, for expressing the juice from a lemon. It is made in a great variety of forms, and is fitted with a strainer to retain the seeds.

lemon-thyme (lem′on-tīm), n. A lemon-scented garden variety of Thymus Serpyllum.

lemon-verbena (lem′on-vėr-bē″nä), n. A garden-shrub, Lippia (Aloysia) citriodora, related to the verbena. Its leaves have a lemon fragrance.

lemon-walnut (lem′on-wâl″nut), n. The butternut, Juglans cinerea: so called on account of its fragrance.

lemonweed (lem′on-wēd), n. A sea-mat of the family Flustridæ: so called from its scent.

lemon-yellow (lem′on-yel″ō), n. 1. A clear pale-yellow color, like that of the rind of a ripe lemon. In entomology it is distinguished from citron-yellow, which is paler and more greenish.—2. A pigment used by artists, composed of barium chromate. It is of a bright lemon hue and quite permanent, but has little body.

Lemur (lē′mėr), n. [NL., so called with ref. to its nocturnal habits and stealthy steps, < L. lemur, only in pl. lemures, a ghost, specter.] 1. The typical genus of Lemuridæ and Lemurinæ. It has been more than coextensive with these groups as now understood, but is now restricted to the typical Lemuridæ with a long furry tail, fox-like face, and typical dentition, such as the ring-tailed lemur, L. catta, and several other species.

2. [l. c.] (a) A member of the genus Lemur, in the widest sense; any lemurine, lemuroid, or prosimian. The ring-tailed, red, ruffed, etc., lemurs belong to the genus Lemur. Gray lemurs, with the tail as long as the body, belong to Hapalemur, as H. griseus, which is about 15 inches long. The broad-nosed lemur is Hapalemur simus. The rather small lemurs with comparatively short tail belong to Lepilemur, as L. mustelinus. Mouse-lemurs are small species of Chirogaleus. (See cut under Chirogaleus.) Dwarf lemurs belong to Microcebus. The lemurs of continental Africa are mostly referred to the genus Galago. (See cut under Galago.) The woolly lemurs or indris form the subfamily Indrisinæ, of the genera Indris, Propithecus, and Microrhynchus; some of these are tailless. The slender lemurs or loris belong to the genus Loris or Stenops (see cuts under Loris); the slow lemurs to Nycticebus. These are Indian, extending to Java, Borneo, Sumatra, and Ceylon. The potto is an African lemur of the genus Perodicticus. The angwantibo is a tailless lemur of the genus Arctocebus. (b) Some animal like a lemur. See flying-lemur and Galeopithecus.—Yellow lemur. Same as kinkajou, 1.

Lemuravidæ (lem-ū-rav′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lemuravus + -idæ.] A family of lemuroid mammals with 44 teeth, from the Lower Eocene of Wyoming, representing a generalized ancestral type.

Lemuravus (lem-ū-rā′vus), n. [NL., < Lemur + L. avus, grandfather.] The typical genus of Lemuravidæ. O. C. Marsh, 1875.

lemures (lem′ū-rēz), n. pl. [L.: see Lemur.] 1. Among the ancient Romans, the spirits of the departed considered as evil-disposed specters or ghosts, who were supposed to do mischief at night to the living, and were exorcised annually with a ceremonial ritual by the head of each household, at midnight on May 9th, 11th, and 13th, on which days was celebrated the festival called lemuralia or lemuria. There were also games and other public observances of the festival. Also called larvæ. Compare Lar[1], 1.

The Lars and Lemures moan with midnight plaint.
Milton, Nativity, l. 171.

2. [cap.] In zoöl.: (a) Lemurs: equivalent to Lemuroidea. (b) A group of noctuid moths. Hübner, 1816.

Lemuria[1] (lē-mū′ri-ä), n. [NL., fem. sing., < Lemur, q.v.] In zoögeog., a supposed former faunal area of the globe, corresponding to some extent to the geographical distribution of the lemurs, and characterized by the abundance and variety of those animals inhabiting it. The existence of any such region or continent is hypothetical, being inferred from, or held to account for, the present peculiar geographical distribution of the lemurs.

Professor Haeckel uses the latter noun [Lemuria] . . . as the name of a continent now largely submerged, which he supposes to have been the center of distribution of the lemuroid ancestors of the higher orders of Mammalia, and part of which has persisted, as Madagascar with its remarkable fauna. Palæontological discoveries have, however, shown that America can . . . lay as good a claim to have been the original home of the lemuroids.
Stand. Nat. Hist., V. 481.

Lemuria[2] (lē-mū′ri-ạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl., < Lemur, q. v.] In some editions of Cuvier's system, a subdivision of the Chiropoda (which comprised Bimana and Quadrumana) by which the lemurs, including Chiromys, are distinguished collectively from monkeys and man. With some little alteration, the division corresponds to the modern suborder Prosimiæ of the order Primates; but the term Lemuria is scarcely in use in this sense. See Prosimiæ.

Lemurian (lē-mū′ri-ạn), a. and n. [< Lemuria[1] + -an.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the region Lemuria.

II. n. One of the hypothetical human inhabitants of Lemuria, or a person supposed to have lived when the supposed Lemuria was an extensive continent. Compare Atlantean, 2.

Lemuridæ (lē-mū′ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lemur + -idæ.] A family of Prosimiæ or Lemuroidea formed by the exclusion of the Tarsiidæ and the Daubentoniidæ; the lemurs proper. The teeth are of three kinds, and the incisors are not gliriform. There are pectoral as well as inguinal mammæ. The fibula is distinct from the tibia, and the bony orbits of the eyes are open behind. The claws of the hind feet are like flattened nails, excepting that of the second toe. These animals are specially characteristic of Madagascar, but many also inhabit Africa, some India and islands further eastward. They are arboricole and quadrumanous, and many of them might be described as fox-like or cat-like monkeys; but their forms are very diverse. Their size ranges from that of a cat to that of a mouse. The family is divided into four subfamilies, Indrisinæ, Lemurinæ, Nycticebinæ, and Galagininæ.

Lemurinæ (lem-ū-rī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Lemur + -inæ.] The typical subfamily of Lemuridæ; lemurs strictly so called. They have more than 30 teeth, usually 36; the tarsus moderate; hind limbs longer than the fore; the tail at least two thirds as long as the body; the ears moderate, with distinct tragus and antitragus, and the anterior portion of the helix folded over; and the spinous processes of the last dorsal and lumbar vertebræ proclivous. The leading genera are Lemur, Hapalemur, Lepilemur, and Chirogaleus.

lemurine (lem′ū-rin), a. and n. [< lemur + -ine[1].] Same as lemuroid.

lemuroid (lem′ū-roid), a. and n. [< lemur + -oid.] I. a. Pertaining to the lemurs or Prosimiæ, or having their characters; lemurine; prosimian.

II. n. One of the Prosimiæ; one of the Lemuridæ; a lemur.

Lemuroidea (lem-ū-roi′dē-ạ), n. pl. [NL., < Lemur + -oidea.] 1. The lemuroids, prosimians, or lemurs at large, a suborder of Primates, distinguished from Anthropoidea; the strepsirrhine quadrumanous mammals. The Lemuroidea are the lower series of Primates, having the cerebrum much less developed, leaving the cerebellum much uncovered; the teats variable, not confined to the breast; the uterus bicornuate; and the clitoris perforated by the urethra. The lacrymal foramen of the skull is outside the orbit of the eye, and the orbit is open behind. The ears are pointed, with indistinct lobules or none. There are three families, Lemuridæ, Tarsiidæ, and Daubentoniidæ (or Chiromyidæ).

2. A superfamily of Prosimiæ, containing the families Lemuridæ and Tarsiidæ, together contrasted with the Daubentonioidea.

len[1]†, v. An older and dialectal form of lend[1].

len[2]†, v. A dialectal form of lain[3].

lena† (lē′nạ), n. [L., a procuress (cf. leno, a procurer), < lenire, persuade, render mild, < lenis, smooth, mild: see lenity.] A procuress: as, "my lean lena," Webster.

Lenæa (lē-nī′ạ), n. pl. [< Gr. Λήναια (sc. ἱερά), neut. pl. of ληναῖος, pertaining to the wine-press (an epithet of Dionysus, or Bacchus), < ληνός, a wine-vat, wine-press.] In Gr. antiq., an Athenian festival in honor of Dionysus (Bacchus), celebrated in the ancient temple of that god, called the Lenaion, to the south of the Acropolis. It was the second of the series of Dionysiac festivals, and took place during the month of Gamelion (part of January and February); it was the occasion of a procession, and of dramatic contests in both tragedy and comedy. See Bacchus and Dionysia.

lencheon (len′chon), n. [Perhaps a corruption of ledging.] In mining, a kind of shelf in a shaft. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]

Lent privately to my Lady Newcut upon her gilt casting-bottle, . . . fifty-five shillings.
Middleton, Your Five Gallants, i. 1.

4. To give for a particular occasion or purpose; grant or yield temporarily or specifically; afford; accommodate (with or to): as, to lend one's ear to an appeal; to lend assistance: often used reflexively: as, to lend one's self to a project.

Friends, Romans, countrymen, lend me your ears.
Shak., J. C., iii. 2. 78.

A little onward lend thy guiding hand
To these dark steps. Milton, S. A., l. 1.

The facility with which the hair lends itself to various methods of treatment.
W. H. Flower, Fashion in Deformity, p. 7.

5. To furnish, impart, or communicate; confer; add: as, "distance lends enchantment to the view."

Lo! where the heath, with withering brake grown o'er,
Lends the light turf that warms the neighboring poor.
Crabbe, Works, I. 5.

And round the roofs a gilded gallery
That lent broad verge to distant lands.
Tennyson, Palace of Art.

Truth is for other worlds, and hope for this;
The cheating future lends the present's bliss.
O. W. Holmes, The Old Prayer.

To lend a hand. See hand.

II. intrans. To make a loan or loans.

Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury.
Deut. xxiii. 20.

I neither lend nor borrow
By taking nor by giving of excess.
Shak., M. of V., i. 3. 62.

lend[1] (lend), n. [< lend[1], v.] A loan: as, will you give me the lend of your spade? [Colloq.]

For the lend of the ass you might give me the mill.
The Crafty Miller (old ballad).

lend[2]† (lend), v. i. [ME. lenden, < AS. lendan, land: see land[1], v.] To land; arrive; dwell; stay; remain.

They put up pavilyons round,
And lendid there that night.
Quoted in Religious Pieces (E. E. T. S.), Gloss., p. 100.

Here is full faire dwellyng for vs,
A lykand place in for to lende.
York Plays, p. 190.

lend[3]†, n. A Middle English form of land[2].

lendable (len′dạ-bl), a. [< lend[1] + -able.] Capable of being lent.

lende[1]† (lend), n. [ME., usually in pl. lendes, leendes, lyndes, < AS. lendenu, lændinu, pl. (in comp. lenden-, rarely lende-), = OS. lendi = OFries. lenden = D. lendenen, pl., = MLG. lende = OHG. lentī, lendī, MHG. G. lende, loin, haunch, = Icel. lend = Dan. lænd = Sw. länd, loin. Cf. L. lumbus, loin, > ult. E. loin: see loin, lumbar.] A loin: usually in the plural.

A barmclooth eek as whit as morne milk
Upon hir lendes, ful of many a gore.
Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 57.

lende[2]†, v. A Middle English form of land[1].

lender (len′dėr), n. [< ME. lendare (with unorig. d as in the verb lend[1]), earlier lener, lenere, leenere, < AS. lǣnere, a lender (= OFries. lener = D. leener = MLG. lēner = OHG. lēhenari, lēhnari, MHG. lēhenære, lēhnære, G. lehener, a lender, a person holding a fief, = Dan. laaner = Sw. lånare, a lender), < lǣnan, lend: see lend[1], v.] One who lends; especially, one who makes a trade of putting money to interest: opposed to borrower.

The borrower is servant to the lender. Prov. xxii. 7.

lending (len′ding), n. [Verbal n. of lend[1], v.] 1. The act of making a loan: as, the lending of money.—2. That which is lent or furnished; something not one's own; a borrowed article.

Off, off, you lendings! come, unbutton here.
Shak., Lear, iii. 4. 113.

Thou lost a good wife, thou lost a trew friend, ha!
Two of the rarest lendings of the heavens.
Marston, Antonio and Mellida, II., iv. 5.

lene[1]†, v. A Middle English form of lean[1].

lene[2]†, a. A Middle English form of lean[2].

lene[3]†, v. A Middle English form of lend[1].

Than moot another paye for oure cost,
Or lene us gold. Chaucer, Shipman's Tale, l. 19.

lene[4] (lē′nē), a. and n. [< L. lenis, neut. lene, smooth: see lenity.] I. a. In philol., smooth; surd and non-aspirate, as k, p, or t.

II. n. A smooth mute or non-aspirate surd, as k, p, or t.

lener†, n. An obsolete variant of lender.

leng[1]†, adv. An obsolete comparative of long[1].

leng[2]†, lenge[1]†, v. [ME., < AS. lengan (= D. lengen, lengthen, = MLG. lengen, lengthen, postpone, = OHG. lengjan, lengan, MHG. lengen, G. längen, lengthen, = Icel. lengja, lengthen, prolong, = Dan. længes, refl., grow longer), prolong, put off, < lang, long: see long[1], length, linger.] I. trans. To lengthen; prolong.

II. intrans. To linger, dwell, rest, or remain.

Lenge at home pur charyté, Leve soon, y prey the.
MS. Cantab. Ff. ii. 38, f. 150. (Halliwell.)

Listen a little, & leng here a while:
Let vs karpe of thies kynges or we cayre ferre.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 4549.

lenge[2]†, n. A Middle English form of ling[1].

lenger†, adv. A Middle English comparative of long[1].

length (length), n. [< ME. lengthe, sometimes lenthe, < AS. length (= D. lengte = Icel. lengd = Dan. længde = Sw. längd), length; with formative -th (cf. lengu, length), < lang, long: see long[1].] 1. The property of being long or extended in a single direction; also, that which is long.

A needless Alexandrine ends the song,
That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 157.

2. Distance along a line, as measured, for example, upon the circumference of a wheel that rolls over it: as, the length of a road, a river, or the arc of a curve.

When thei aproched nygh thei lete renne and smyte to-geder so harde that ye myght here the strokes half a myle of length. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), ii. 161.

Our Lady streete is very faire, being of a great length, though not so broad as our Cheapside in London.
Coryat, Crudities, I. 30.

Every measuring instrument is liable to change its length with temperature. It is therefore necessary, in defining a length by reference to a concrete material standard, such as a bar of metal, to state the temperature at which the standard is correct.
J. D. Everett, Units and Phys. Const., p. 17.

3. The magnitude of the greatest principal axis of a body or figure; one of the dimensions of a body, the others being breadth and thickness. See dimension, 1. Thus, the length of a stick of timber is not its longest measurement, between opposite angles, but is the shortest distance between the ends. Every body has three principal axes, which are capable of being determined with mathematical precision; and in most cases we can see what they are near enough for practical purposes. The distance between the extremities of the longest of these three axes is the length of the body.

& cleymed him for ther chefe of West and of Est,
Of North & of South in length & in brede.
Rob. of Brunne, p. 19.

Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it. Gen. xiii. 17.

So stretch'd out huge in length the Arch-fiend lay.
Milton, P. L., i. 209.

4. Reach; power of reaching; extent of range: as, the length of one's vision or of a view.

Within my sword's length set him; if he 'scape,
Heaven forgive him too! Shak., Macbeth, iv. 3. 234.

She . . . holds them dangling at arm's length in scorn.
Cowper, Truth, l. 104.

5. Extent of or in time; duration; continuance: as, the length of a day or a year, or of life; the length of a battle or a performance; a discourse of tedious length.

He asked life of thee, and thou gavest it him, even length of days for ever and ever. Ps. xxi. 4.

Now length of fame (our second life) is lost.
Pope, Essay on Criticism, p. 480.

6. In orthoëpy and prosody: (a) The time occupied in uttering a vowel or syllable; quantity. (b) The quality of a vowel as long or short, according to the conventional distinction of long and short in English pronunciation. (c) The quality of a syllable as metrically accented or unaccented in modern or accentual poetry. See long[1], a.—7. A piece or portion of the extent of anything in space or time; a part of what is extended or elongated: as, a length of rope; a dress-length; to cut anything into short lengths: often used specifically of a definite portion, of known extent, of the thing spoken of, as of an acting drama (namely, forty or forty-two lines): as, an actor's part of six lengths; won by a length (that is, of the horse, boat, etc., engaged in the contest).

Large lengths of seas and shores
Between my father and my mother lay.
Shak., K. John, i. 1. 105.

Time glides along with undiscover'd haste,
The future but a length behind the past.
Dryden, tr. of Ovid.

Ten lengths from the big double he was out of his rider's hand, and going as fast as he could drive.
Whyte Melville, Satanella, p. 128.

8. In archery, the distance from the archer to the target he is to shoot at.—A cable's length, a measure of distance in charts and sailing directions, about 100 fathoms (600 feet). The regular length of a chain cable is 120 fathoms (720 feet). See cable's-length.—A great length, a long way or distance toward any end or object.—At full length, fully extended; to or in the greatest extension.—At length. (a) To or in the full extent; without curtailment: as, to write a name at length; to read a document at length. (b) After a time; at last; at the end, or at a point of transition: as, at length he came to a spring; at length they were subdued.—Basi-alveolar length. See basi-alveolar.—Basinasal length. See basinasal.—Butt's length. See butt[2].—Focal length. See focal distance (b), under focal.—Iron's length. See iron.—Length of days, long life; prolonged existence.

Length of days is in her right hand. Prov. iii. 16.

Length of one's nose. See nose.—On length†, away.

Draw the to pese with alle thy strength;
Fro stryf and bate draw the on lengthe.
Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 304.

To go to all lengths, to exhaust all means; use extreme efforts or measures to do everything possible without scruple: as, he went to all lengths to compass his purposes.—To go to the length of. (a) To go to; proceed as far as. (b) To go to the extent of; rise to the pitch or height of: commonly used of inordinate action or speech: as, he went to the length of tearing down his house, of denying his identity, or of sacrificing his own interests.—To keep a length, in archery, to maintain the same distance in shooting; shoot uniformly as to distance; shoot the same distance with each arrow.—To march to the length of†. Same as to go to the length of (a).

He had marched to the length of Exeter.
Clarendon, Great Rebellion.

To measure one's length. See measure.—Unit of length. See unit.

length† (length), v. t. [ME. lengthen; < length, n.] To extend; lengthen.

"For sche hade brouȝt hem of bale bothe," thei seide, "& i-lengthed here lif mani long ȝere."
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1040.

And knowes ful wel life doth but length his paine.
Mir. for Mags., p. 264.

And mingled yarn to length her web withall.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 2.

lengthen (leng'thn), v. [< length + -en[1]. Cf. length, v.] I. trans. To make long or longer; extend or elongate in space or in duration; protract or prolong: as, to lengthen a line; to lengthen life; to lengthen a vowel or syllable in pronunciation.

Why do I overlive?
Why am I mock'd with death, and lengthen'd out
To deathless pain? Milton, P. L., x. 774.

The bare white roads
Lengthening in solitude their dreary line.
Wordsworth, Prelude, xiii.

II. intrans. To grow long or longer; extend in length.

And gasping, panting, fainting, labour on
With heavier strides, that lengthen tow'rd the town.
Pope, Iliad, xxi. 636.

Drags at each remove a lengthening chain.
Goldsmith, Traveller, l. 10.

lengthful (length'fûl), a. [< length + -ful.] Of considerable or remarkable length; lengthy; long. [Rare.]

The driver whirls his lengthful thong. Pope, Iliad, xi.

lengthily (leng'thi-li), adv. In a lengthy manner; at great length.

lengthiness (leng'thi-nes), n. The quality of being lengthy; prolixity.

lengthways (length'wāz), adv. Same as lengthwise.

lengthwise (length'wīz), adv. [< length + -wise.] In the direction of the length; in a longitudinal direction.

lengthy (leng'thi), a. [< length + -y[1].] Having length; long; especially, of great length; immoderately long, sometimes with the idea of tediousness attached: applied chiefly to discourses, writings, arguments, proceedings, etc.: as, a lengthy sermon; a lengthy dissertation. [Said by Richardson to have originated in the United States (see the allusions in Southey and Lowell below), but the earliest quotations found are from British authors.]

Sometimes a poet when he publishes what in America would be called a lengthy poem with lengthy annotations, advises the reader in his preface not to read the notes in their places as they occur, . . . but to read the poem by itself at first. Southey, The Doctor, clx.

The word lengthy has been charged to our American account, but it must have been invented by the first reader of Gower's works, the only inspiration of which they were ever capable. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 259.

Next came a body of about one hundred and fifty persons on horseback, each carrying a very lengthy Persian-made rifle. O'Donovan, Merv, x.

lenience (lē'niens), n. [< lenien(t) + -ce.] Same as leniency.

leniency (lē'nien-si), n. [< lenien(t) + -cy.] The quality of being lenient; mildness; gentleness; lenity.

The House has always shown a wise leniency in dealing with improper words blurted out in the heat of argument. Fortnightly Rev., N. S., XXXIX. 264.

=Syn. Leniency, Lenity, Clemency, Mercy; humanity, tenderness, forbearance. Clemency is exercised only toward offenders, being especially the attribute of those in exalted places having power to remit or lighten penalty. Leniency, as a word, is much more common and expressive than lenity; leniency or lenity may be practised by any one having authority to lighten or remit penalty or to excuse from tasks: as, the leniency of a judge, a parent, or a teacher. Mercy has a twofold use, expressing clemency toward offenders or great kindness toward the distressed; in either sense it is a strong word.

lenient (lē'nient), a. and n. [= OF. lenient = Sp. Pg. It. leniente, < L. lenien(t-)s, ppr. of lenire, soften, soothe, < lenis, soft: see lenity.] I. a. 1. Softening; mitigating; assuasive. [Archaic.]

Consolatories writ
With studied argument, and much persuasion sought,
Lenient of grief and anxious thought.
Milton, S. A., l. 659.

Those lenient cares, which, with our own combined,
By mix'd sensations ease th' afflicted mind.
Crabbe, Works, I. 140.

[Old Time] upon these wounds hath laid
His lenient touches. Wordsworth, Sonnets, iii. 8.

2. Relaxing; emollient; lenitive. [Rare.]

Oils relax the fibres, are lenient, balsamic.
Arbuthnot, Aliments.

3. Acting or disposed to act without rigor or severity; mild; gentle; merciful; clement.

The law is remarkably lenient towards debtors.
E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 124.

A critic should be lenient when considering speculations of this nature. Science, VII. 556.

=Syn. 3. Forbearing, tender. See leniency.

II.† n. An emollient; a lenitive.

Therefore I do advise the use of lenients, not only by the authority of those ancient and modern chirurgeons, but by my own practice. Wiseman, Surgery, v. 9.

leniently (lē'nient-li), adv. In a lenient manner; assuagingly; mildly.

Leniently as he was treated by his contemporaries, posterity has treated him more leniently still.
Macaulay, Lord Bacon.

lenify (len'i-fī), v. t.; pret. and pp. lenified, ppr. lenifying. [< OF. lenifier, F. lénifier = Pr. Sp. Pg. lenificar = It. lenificare, < L. lenis, smooth, soft, mild, + facere, make: see -fy.] To assuage; soften; mitigate. [Now rare.]

That sorowe whiche shall assaile me by reason of your absence I will sweten and lenefie with contentation.
Barnaby Rich, Farewell to Military Profession.

My Lord Treasurer Clifford, who could not endure I should lenifie my style when a war with Holland was the subject. Evelyn, To Pepys.

All soft'ning simples, known of sov'reign use,
He presses out and pours their noble juice;
These first infus'd, to lenify the pain,
He tugs with pincers, but he tugs in vain.
Dryden, Æneid, xii. 592.

leniment (len'i-ment), n. [= OF. leniment, liniment, < L. lenimentum, a soothing remedy, < lenire, soften, soothe: see lenient, a.] A soothing application; a liniment.

lenitive (len'i-tiv), a. and n. [= F. lénitif = Pr. lenitiu = Sp. Pg. It. lenitivo, < L. as if lenitivus*, < lenitus, pp. of lenire, soften: see lenient.] I. a. Assuaging; palliating.

Those milks have all an acrimony; though one would think they should be lenitive. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 639.

II. n. 1. A medicine or an application that has the quality of easing pain; anything which softens or mitigates.

Thy linative appli'de did ease my paine;
For, though thou did forbid, twas no restraine.
Marie Magdalens Lamentations (1601). (Nares.)

Address
Some lenitives, t' allay the fi'riness
Of this disease. Daniel, Civil Wars, viii.

Their pain soft arts of pharmacy can ease,
Thy breast alone no lenitives appease.
Pope, Iliad, xvi. 39.

2. Anything which tends to allay passion or excitement; a palliative.

I did apply some lenitives to soften
His anger, and prevail'd.
Shirley, Brothers, iv. 1.

There is one sweet lenitive at least for evils, which Nature holds out; so I took it kindly at her hands, and fell asleep. Sterne, Sentimental Journey, p. 43.

lenitiveness (len'i-tiv-nes), n. The quality of being lenitive or emollient. Bailey, 1727.

lenitude† (len'i-tūd), n. [= OF. lenitude, < L. lenitudo, softness, mildness, < lenis, soft: see lenity.] Lenity. Blount.

lenity (len'i-ti), n. [< OF. lenite, F. lénité = Sp. lenidad = Pg. lenidade = It. lenità, < L. lenita(t-)s, softness, smoothness, mildness, < lenis, soft, smooth.] Mildness of temper; softness; tenderness; mercy.

But they now, made worse through his lenitie & gentlenes, cast stones at him & brake his head.
J. Udall, On Mark xii.

Glorious is the victorie Conquerours use with lenitie.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 104.

=Syn. See leniency.

lennert (len'ėrt), n. [A dial. var. of linnet[1].] The linnet or lintie. [Prov. Eng.]

leno (lē'nō), n. [A corrupt form of F. linon, lawn: see linon.] A very thin linen cloth made in imitation of muslin, and sometimes called linen muslin. It is used for translucent window-blinds, and for other purposes for which a gauzy fabric is needed.

"Why, twenty years ago," she exclaimed, "I bought a lot of leno cheap—it was just about going out of fashion for caps then, I think."
Mayhew, London Labour and London Poor, I. 430.

lenocinant† (lē-nos'i-nant), a. [< L. lenocinan(t-)s, ppr. of lenocinari, flatter, entice, < leno, fem. lena, a pander: see lena[1].] Given to lewdness.

lenocinium (lē-nō-sin'i-um), n. [L., the trade of a pander, < leno, a pander: see lena[1].] In Scots law, a husband's connivance at his wife's ★adultery.

lens (lenz), n.; pl. lenses (len'zez). [= Sp. Pg. It. lente (It. also, as E., after L., lens = D. lens = G. linse = Dan. lindse = Sw. lins), < NL. lens, a lens, so called from its shape, < L. lens, a lentil (which is shaped like a double-convex lens): see lentil.] 1. A piece of transparent substance bounded by two curved surfaces (usually spherical), or by a curved surface and a plane. The ordinary use of a lens is to cause pencils of rays to converge or diverge systematically after passing through it. Lenses for optical purposes are usually made of glass; acoustic lenses, of carbon dioxid inclosed between two thin membranes; lenses for action upon electrical radiations, of paraffin or pitch, substances which are transparent to electrical rays, though opaque to light. Optical lenses alone are in common use. Ordinary lenses are distinguished into two classes—convex or magnifying lenses, which are thickest in the center, and concave, which are thinnest in the center. Each class has three varieties, as shown in fig. 1. To the first belong D, the double-convex or biconvex; C, the plano-convex; and E, the meniscus. The concave lenses are B, the double-concave or biconcave; A, the plano-concave; and F, the concavo-convex, sometimes improperly called concave meniscus. The line which passes through the centers of curvature of the two surfaces is the axis of the lens, and a point on this axis so taken that every line drawn through it pierces parallel elements of the two surfaces is its optical center. A convex lens converges rays which are parallel to its axis, approximately to a point called its principal focus (F in fig. 2). The distance from the optical center to this focus is the same on both sides of the lens, and depends upon the radii of its curved surfaces and the material of which it is made. Rays diverging from a point beyond the principal focus F on either side of the lens are approximately collected to a "real" focus beyond the principal focus on the other side (see fig. 3); but if the source of light is between the lens and its principal focus, the rays after emergence diverge as if they came from a so-called virtual focus behind the luminous point. The luminous point and its focus are interchangeable, and are called conjugate foci, as, for instance, L and l in fig. 3.

(See focus, 1.) A concave lens always renders still more divergent rays emanating from a point, and so forms only virtual foci. If the source of light is an extended surface, then the pencil of rays emanating from each point forms its own focus; and the collection of foci constitutes an image, which is real and inverted if the foci are real, but virtual and erect if they are virtual. The relative sizes of the object and image are sensibly proportional, if the lens is thin, to their respective distances from the optical center; if the lens is thick, the distances must be reckoned from the two so-called principal points of the lens (see principal point, under point), which lie on the axis on each side of the optical center. An image formed by a single lens is never perfectly distinct, on account of the spherical and chromatic aberrations of the lens. (See aberration, 4.) The former is due to the fact that a lens bounded by spherical surfaces converges marginal rays to a point nearer the lens than that in which the central rays meet; the latter, to the fact that rays of different color form their foci at different distances, the focal distance for violet rays being (with a glass lens) nearly a seventh part shorter than that for the red rays. The spherical aberration can be corrected by making the surfaces of forms other than spherical, or by combining two or more lenses properly proportioned; the chromatic aberration, only by combining two or more convex and concave lenses of different materials, usually a convex of crown-glass with a concave of flint-glass.

2. In anat., in the eye, a double-convex body placed in the axis of vision behind the iris between the aqueous humor and the vitreous humor, serving to focus rays of light upon the retina; the crystalline lens. See first cut under eye[1].—3. Figuratively, photography, from the use of lenses in that art.

> So thoroughly has this region been set forth by the pen and the pencil and the lens that I am relieved of the necessity of describing it. Harper's Mag., LXXVIII. 258.

4. [cap.] [NL.] An untenable name for Lentilla, a genus of leguminous plants of the tribe Vicieæ. It is distinguished from Vicia by having but two ovules instead of many, as is generally the case in Vicia. There are about 6 species, low erect or half-climbing herbs with pinnate leaves and small single or racemose pale-blue flowers, natives of the Mediterranean region and eastern Asia. One species, Lentilla Lens, the seeds of which are called lentils, is probably one of the oldest of plants cultivated by man for food. See lentil.—Achromatic lens. See achromatic.—Actinic lens, a compound lens so constructed that its chemical and luminous foci coincide.—Aplanatic lens, a compound lens in which both chromatic and spherical aberrations are corrected.—Apochromatic lens, a microscope-objective made from certain peculiar kinds of glass, by means of which the aberrations can be more accurately corrected than in lenses made of the ordinary crown- and flint-glass.—Burning-lens, a convex lens used to concentrate the heat of the sun at its focus.—Camera-lens, a combination of lenses used in a camera obscura. See camera.—Capsule of the lens. See capsule.—Cartesian lens. See Cartesian.—Coddington lens, a lens formed from a sphere of glass by cutting a deep and wide equatorial groove around it, and filling the groove with some opaque substance.—Collimating lens. See collimating.—Concave lens, a lens that is thinner at the center than at the edge.—Condensing-lens, or condenser, a convex lens or a combination of lenses used to concentrate a strong light upon some point or surface, as upon the slit of a spectroscope or a microscopic object, or a photographic negative in the process of making an enlarged picture.—Convex lens, a lens that is thicker at the center than at the edge.—Copying-lens, a photographic lens specially designed for copying engravings, etc.—Crossed lens, a glass lens the spherical surfaces of which have radii bearing the ratio of 1 to 6. It has less spherical aberration than any other form of glass lens with spherical surfaces.—Crystalline lens. See def. 2, crystalline, and eye[1], 1.—Cylindrical lens, a lens which has one or both surfaces cylindrical: commonly used in eye-glasses to correct astigmatism of the eye. See astigmatism.—Diamond lens, a lens made from a diamond.—Doublet (lens), a combination of two lenses separated by a small distance. Sometimes each of the two is itself compound.—Field lens, in an eyepiece, the lens which is furthest from the eye, and has the special function of enlarging the field of view.—Fluid lens. See fluid.—Fresnel lens, a lens (bearing the name of its inventor) formed of a central plano-convex lens surrounded by segmental rings, all having the same focus. The separate pieces are cemented to a plane glass or set in a metal frame. (Fig. 4 represents the cross-section of such a lens.) It is used in lighthouses and signal-lamps.—Immersion-lens, a microscope-objective which requires a drop of water or other liquid to be put between it and the cover of the object under examination, thus increasing the angle of aperture and obviating loss of light by reflection.—Landscape lens, a photographic lens specially adapted to landscape photography.—Magnifying-lens, a lens used to increase the apparent size of an object seen through it. A convex lens held near the eye produces this effect when the distance of the object from the lens is less than the principal focal length of the lens.

Fig. 4. Fresnel Lens.

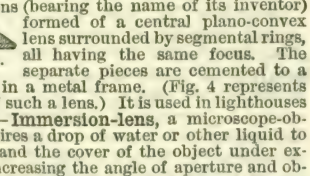

Fig. 5.

(O F in fig. 5.) The rays from the object A B, after passing through the lens, reach the eye as if they came from the virtual image a b.—Multiplying-lens, a plano-convex lens the convex side of which has been worked into a number of plane facets, each of which presents a separate image (virtual, and not magnified) of the object viewed through it.—Orthoscopic lens, a form of achromatic doublet giving a very flat and undistorted field of view.—Periscopic lens, a lens with a very wide field of view. The name is specially applied to spectacle-lenses which are concave on the surface next the eye; also to some wide-angle photographic lenses.—Photographic lens, a lens or combination of lenses adapted for photography. Ordinarily the lens of the photographic camera is a combination of two achromatic lenses of peculiar curves, mounted in a tube with a considerable space between them. (See fig. 6.) The photographic objective of a telescope is like an ordinary achromatic objective, except that its curves are adjusted to bring the blue and violet rays to the most accurate focus possible, rather than the yellow and green rays, which are most effective in vision.—Polyzonal lens. Same as Fresnel lens.—Portrait-lens, a photographic lens specially adapted to the taking of portraits.—Rectilinear lens, a photographic lens so constructed that straight lines in the object will not be distorted into curved lines in the picture.—Side-condensing lens, a condensing-lens so attached to a microscope as to illuminate an opaque object by side-light.—Stanhope lens, a lens of small diameter with two convex faces of different radii, inclosed in a metallic tube.—Triplet lens, a combination of three lenses, usually all achromatic. The ordinary form of microscope-objective is a triplet.—Wide-angle lens, a photographic lens capable of making a distinct and undistorted picture of objects which subtend angles of 60° to 100° or more as seen from the camera; also, a microscope-objective which admits from each point of the object a pencil of rays of wide angle (often as much as 140° and upward); an objective of large angular aperture. See aperture, 4.

Fig. 6. Photographic Lens (Type of Portrait Lens).

lens-cap (lenz'kap), n. A cap or cover fitting over the opening of the tube of a lens.

lens-holder (lenz'hōl″dėr), n. A device for supporting a lens, or a combination of lenses, during the adjustment to the focus of an object on an adjustable forceps or stage below. E. H. Knight.

Lent[1] (lent), n. [< ME. lent, lente, an abbr. of lenten[1], the final syllable being appar. taken as inflexive: see lenten[1].] An annual fast of forty days, beginning with Ash Wednesday and continuing till Easter, observed from very early times in the Christian church, in commemoration of Christ's forty days' fast (Mat. iv. 2), and as a season of special penitence and preparation for the Easter feast. The lenten fast is now observed as obligatory by the Orthodox Greek and other Oriental churches, and by the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Lutheran churches, and as a profitable exercise by many members of other churches. It has varied in length at different times and in different parts of the church, and has begun later or earlier according as Sundays only or Saturdays also were excepted from fasting. In the Western Church it begins on Ash Wednesday, forty-six days before Easter; but as the intervening Sundays, called Sundays in (not of) Lent, are (on the ground that Sunday is always a feast-day) not counted part of Lent, the fast lasts only forty days. The first Sunday in Lent is known as Quadragesima Sunday, the fourth as Mid-Lent Sunday, the fifth as Passion Sunday, and the sixth (beginning Holy Week) as Palm Sunday. The two weeks and a half preceding Lent, beginning with Septuagesima, following which are Sexagesima and Quinquagesima Sundays, form the pre-lenten season, a transition between the joyful Christmas and Epiphany season and the penitential season of Lent. In medieval times the name Lent (or, in Latin, Quadragesima) was given to other periods of fasting also. Forty days between Martinmas (November 11th) and Christmas Eve were called St. Martin's Lent (Quadragesima S. Martini), and another Lent preceded St. John Baptist's day (June 24th). In distinction from these, the period between Ash Wednesday and Easter was called Great Lent and Clean Lent, the last name being probably given on account of the preceding confession and absolution. In the Greek Church Lent (Τεσσαρακοστή) begins on the Monday after Tyrophagus (Quinquagesima), and the first, third, and sixth Sundays are called Orthodoxy Sunday, Stauroproskynesimos (Sunday of the Adoration of the Cross), and Palm Sunday respectively.

> If it may be, fast
> Whole Lents, and pray.
> Tennyson, St. Simeon Stylites.

Great Lent, Great fast, in the Gr. Ch., the lenten fast, as the most important fast of the year, in distinction from other seasons of fasting, to which the name Lent (as equivalent to Τεσσαρακοστή) is also given by Western writers: namely, that between St. Philip's day (November 14th) and Christmas (Fast of St. Philip or of the nativity), that after All Saints' Sunday, which corresponds to the Western Trinity Sunday (Fast of the Apostles), and that from August 1st to the 14th, the eve of the Repose of Theotocos (Fast of the Theotocos).—Head of Lent. See head.—Lent collectors. See collector, 5.—Lent determination. See determination, 12.

lent[2] (lent). Preterit and past participle of lend[1].

lent[3] (lent), a. [< OF. and F. lent = Sp. Pg. It. lento, pliant, flexible, tenacious, slow, sluggish, easy, calm, < L. lentus (in form as if contr. of lenitus, pp. of lenire, soften), < lenis, soft, smooth, gentle, akin to E. lithe: see lenity, lenient, etc., and leath[1], lithe[1]. Hence relent.] 1†. Slow; gentle; mild.

> We must now increase
> Our fire to ignis ardens: we are past
> Fimus equinus, balnei cineris,
> And all those lenter heats.
> B. Johnson, Alchemist, iii. 2.

2. In music, same as lento.

lentando (len-tän'dō), adv. [It., ppr. of lentare, make slow, < lento, slow: see lent[3], a.] In music, slackening; retarding: a direction to sing or play with increasing slowness the notes over which it is written.

lentet, n. [ME., < OF. lente, < L. len(t-)s, a lentil: see lens, lentil.] A lentil. Wyclif.

lenten[1] (len'ten), n. and a. [< ME. lenten, rarely lenton, leinten (also abbr. lente, leinte, whence mod. E. lent), < AS. lencten, lengten, rarely lenten (= D. lente = MLG. lente, lenten, linte = OHG. lenzin, lengizin (in lengizinmānōth), also lenzo, MHG. lenze, G. lenz), the spring, later applied esp. to the fast beginning in the spring, called in full lenctenfæsten, i. e. 'spring-fast,' usually derived < lang, long (whence also length and lengthen), "because the days become longer in spring": see long[1], a. This derivation is supported by the var. forms OHG. langiz, MHG. langez, langeze (appar. < lang, long); but the deriv. is irreg. in form and thought, and the OHG. MHG. var. forms may be due to popular etymology. It is not probable that the word is connected with long. In mod. use lenten as a noun is abbr. to lent, while in attrib. use it remains unchanged, being taken as an adj. in -en[2].] I.† n. 1. The spring; the season following winter.—2. A fast observed in the spring: same as Lent[1] (of which lenten is the older form).

> To leue ne to lere, ne lentenes to faste.
> Piers Plowman (C), xiv. 81.

II. a. [cap. or l. c.] 1. Pertaining to Lent; used in Lent: as, Lenten sermons; the lenten fast.

> And perhaps it was the same politick drift that the Divell whipt St. Jerom in a lenten dream, for reading Cicero. Milton, Areopagitica, p. 14.

Hence—2. Characteristic of or suitable for Lent; spare; plain; meager: as, lenten fare.

> If you delight not in man, what lenten entertainment the players shall receive from you.
> Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2, 329.
>
> Who can read
> In thy pale face, dead eye, and lenten suit,
> The liberty thy ever-giving hand
> Hath bought for others?
> Beau. and Fl., Honest Man's Fortune, iv. 1.
>
> Meanwhile she quench'd her fury at the flood,
> And with a lenten sallad cool'd her blood.
> Dryden, Hind and Panther, iii. 27.

3†. Cold; austere: as, a lenten lover. Compare Lent-lover. Cotgrave.—Lenten fig, a dried fig; a raisin.—Lenten hearse. Same as tenebræ-hearse.—Lenten veil, a curtain formerly suspended in the Western Church before the high altar during Lent, and said to be still in use in Spain. It was a survival of the primitive amphithyra, retained in the Greek Church.

lenten[2] (len'ten), n. A dialectal variant of linden.

lenten-crab (len'ten-krab), n. A fresh-water crab of southern Europe, Thelphusa fluviatilis, allowed to be eaten in Lent.

lenthet, n. A Middle English form of length.

Lentibulariaceæ (len-tib-ū-lā-ri-ā'sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Lindley, 1845), < Lentibularia (said to be (irreg.) < L. lens (lent-), a lentil, + tubulus, a small pipe or tube), old name for Utricularia, + -aceæ.] A family of dicotyledonous sympetalous plants, for which the name Pinguiculaceæ (Dumortier, 1829) is to be preferred, Lentibularia, upon which it is based, being no longer recognized as a genus.

lenticel (len'ti-sel), n. [Also lenticelle; < F. lenticelle, dim. of lenticule, lens-shaped: see lenticule.] 1. In bot., a lens-shaped body of cells formed in the periderm or corky layer of bark, which by its enlargement soon ruptures the epidermis, or the older corky layers where such are present. Outwardly lenticels appear in the earliest stage merely as brighter spots, then as oval warts, becoming two-lipped; while in some plants they widen with the growth of the stem into transverse striæ. They are produced either beneath a stoma or group of stomata or independently. Their intercellular spaces communicate with the outer air, and thus serve as cortical pores. The outer (not corky) cells of a lenticel are termed packing or complementary cells. These arise from the outer side of a phellogenic layer of meristematic cells which internally produce phelloderm.

2. In anat., one of the small mucous crypts or follicles of the base of the tongue having the shape of a lentil; a lenticular gland.

lenticellate (len-ti-sel'āt), a. [< lenticel + -ate[1].] Pertaining to or having lenticels.

lenticelle, n. See lenticel.

lenticula (len-tik'ū-lą), n.; pl. lenticulæ (-lē). ★[L., a lentil, a lentil shape, a vessel of lentil shape, a freckle: see lentil, lenticule.] 1. In optics, a small lens.—2. In bot.: (a) A lenticel. (b) The spore-case of some fungi.—3. A freckle; an ephelis.

Also lenticule.

★lenticular (len-tik′ū-lăr), a. [= F. lenticulaire = Pr. Sp. Pg. lenticular = It. lenticolare, < L. lenticularis, lentil-shaped, < lenticula, a lentil: see lenticule, lentil.] 1. Resembling a lentil in size or form.—2. Having the form of a double-convex lens, as some seeds.—Lenticular bone. Same as lenticulare.—Lenticular fever†, fever attended with an eruption of small pimples.—Lenticular ganglion. See ganglion.—Lenticular gland. Same as lenticel, 2.—Lenticular mark or space, in entom., one having the outline of a double-convex lens as seen from the side, bounded by two convexly curved lines which meet in two points.—Lenticular nucleus, the lower of the two gray nuclei of the corpus striatum. It is somewhat conical in shape, with base outward toward the insula. It is divided into three parts by medullary layers parallel to the base. The outermost segment is called the putamen, the two inner the globus pallidus; the innermost is more or less indistinctly divided into two. The lenticular nucleus is separated from the caudate nucleus and from the optic thalamus by the internal capsule.—Lenticular process of the incus of a mammal. See incus (a).

lenticulare (len-tik-ū-lā′rē), n.; pl. lenticularia (-ri-ă). [NL., neut. of L. lenticularis, lenticular: see lenticular.] A bone of the carpus of some reptiles, as crocodiles. It is an oval ossicle situated between the ulnar proximal carpal bone and the second to fifth metacarpals, supporting the third to fifth of these entirely. Huxley, Anat. Vert., p. 220.

lenticularly (len-tik′ū-lăr-li), adv. In a lenticular manner; like a lens; with a curve.

lenticule (len′ti-kūl), n. [< F. lenticule, a., lentil-shaped (as a noun, duckweed), = Sp. lenticula, < L. lenticula, a lentil: see lentil.] Same as lenticula.

lenticulite (len-tik′ū-līt), n. [< L. lenticula, lentil, + *-ite*2.] In geol., a fossil of lenticular shape.

lenticulostriate (len-tik″ū-lō-strī′āt), a. [< L. lenticula, lentil, + NL. striatus, furrowed: see striate.] Pertaining to the lenticular portion of the corpus striatum of the brain. Specifically applied to one of the anterolateral nutritive arteries from the middle cerebral or Sylvian artery, which from the frequency with which it bleeds is called by Charcot the "artery of cerebral hemorrhage."

lentiform (len′ti-fôrm), a. [= F. It. lentiforme, < L. lens (lent-), a lentil, + forma, form.] Having the form of a lens; lenticular: as, the lentiform nucleus of the striate body of the brain.

lentigerous (len-tij′ę-rus), a. [< NL. len(t-)s, a lens, + L. gerere, carry, bear.] Provided with a crystalline lens, as an eye: applied to the eyes of some mollusks, as cephalopods, in distinction from punctigerous.

lentigines, n. Plural of lentigo, 1.

lentiginose (len-tij′i-nōs), a. [< LL. lentiginosus, freckled: see lentiginous.] In bot. and zoöl., covered with minute dots as if dusted or freckled; speckled.

lentiginous (len-tij′i-nus), a. [= F. lentigineux = It. lentigginoso, < LL. lentiginosus, freckled, < L. lentigo (-in-), a freckly eruption, freckles: see lentigo.] Same as lentiginose.

lentigo (len-tī′gō), n. [NL., < L. lentigo, a lentil-shaped spot, a freckly eruption, < lens (lent-), a lentil: see lentil.] 1. Pl. lentigines (len-tij′i-nēz). In med., a freckle; abstractly, a freckly condition; the presence of freckles.—2. [cap.] ★In zoöl., a genus of mollusks.

lentil (len′til), n. [< ME. lentil, < OF. lentille, F. lentille = Sp. lenteja = Pg. lentilha = It. lenticchia, < L. lenticula, a lentil, < lens (lent-), a lentil: see lens. Cf. lenticula, lenticule.] 1. The annual leguminous plant Lentilla Lens (Lens esculenta of some authors), or its seeds. Its native country is doubtless that in which it is now widely cultivated, viz., the Mediterranean region and the Orient. It has been in use in Egypt and the East from a high antiquity. The small flattened seeds furnish a nutritious food, similar to peas and beans, and are cooked whole or split or ground into meal. The leafy stems of the lentil serve as fodder.

2†. pl. Freckles; lentigo.

> The root brought into a liniment cureth the lentils or red spots. Holland, tr. of Pliny, xxii. 21.

3. In apparatus for rectifying alcohol, one of the lentil-shaped bulbs (of which there are generally two, but may be more) placed in the condenser between the coil and the pipe leading from the column of the still. See still and rectification.—Water-lentils, the duckweed Lemna minor. [Prov. Eng.]

lentil-shell (len′til-shel), n. A shell of the genus Ervilia.

lentiner†, n. See lentner.

lentiscus (len-tis′kus), n.; pl. lentisci (-sī). [L., the mastic-tree.] Same as lentisk.

lentisk (len′tisk), n. [Also lentisc; < ME. lentiske = F. lentisque = Pr. lentisc = Sp. Pg. lentisco = It. lentischio, < L. lentiscus, also lentiscum, the mastic-tree.] The mastic-tree, Pistacia Lentiscus. See mastic-tree and Pistacia.

> In this tract all the heathes or com'ons are cover'd with rosemary, lavender, lentiscs, and the like sweet shrubes. Evelyn, Diary, Sept. 30, 1644.

lentitude† (len′ti-tūd), n. [< OF. lentitude = Sp. lentitud, < L. lentitudo, slowness, < lentus, slow, tenacious: see *lent*3, a.] Slowness. Bailey, 1731.

Lent-lily (lent′lil″i), n. The daffodil: so named from its time of flowering. Also called Lent-rose. [Prov. Eng.]

> A silk pavilion, gay with gold
> In streaks and rays, and all Lent-lily in hue,
> Save that the dome was purple.
> Tennyson, Gareth and Lynette.

Lent-lover†, n. A cold lover; a lenten lover. See *lenten*1, a., 3.

> These dolent, contemplative Lent-lovers.
> Urquhart, tr. of Rabelais, ii. 21. (Davies.)

lentner†, lentiner† (lent′nėr, len′ti-nėr), n. [< lenten + *-er*1: "so called because taken during that season" (?).] A kind of hawk.

> If I should enlarge my discourse to the observation of the . . . Haggard, and the two sorts of Lentners, . . . it would be much . . . pleasure to me.
> I. Walton, Complete Angler, i. 1.

lento (len′tō), a. [It., slow: see *lent*3, a.] In music, at a slow tempo. Also lent.

lentoid (len′toid), a. [< L. len(t-)s, a lentil (see lens), + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Having the form of a lentil or a double-convex lens; lens-shaped.

> When Assyria and Phœnicia took the place of Babylonia . . . as civilizing powers, the cylinder made way for the lentoid or cone-like seal.
> A. H. Sayce, Pref. to Schliemann's Troja, p. xx.

lenton†, n. A Middle English form of *lenten*1.

lentor, lentour (len′tor), n. [= F. lenteur = Sp. Pg. lentor = It. lentore, < L. lentor, flexibility, pliancy, < lentus, pliant, tenacious, also slow, sluggish: see *lent*3, a.] 1. Tenacity; viscousness; viscidity, as of fluids.

> Some bodies have a kinde of lentour, and are of a more depertible nature than others. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 857.
>
> By reason of their clamminess and lentor they [arborescent hollyhocks] are banished from our sallet.
> Evelyn, Acetaria.

2†. Slowness; delay; sluggishness.

> The lentor of eruptions not inflammatory points to an acid cause. Arbuthnot, Aliments.

lentous† (len′tus), a. [< L. lentus, pliant, tenacious, viscous, slow: see *lent*3, a.] Viscid; viscous; tenacious.

> In this [a frog's] spawn of a lentous and transparent body are to be discerned many specks.
> Sir T. Browne, Vulg. Err., iii. 13.

Lent-rose (lent′rōz), n. Same as Lent-lily. [Prov. Eng.]

lent-seed† (lent′sēd), n. [ME. lenteseed, linteseed; < *lent*1 + seed.] Seeds sown in spring.

> Lynne-seed and lik-seed and lente-seedes alle
> Aren nouht so worthy as whete.
> Piers Plowman (C), xiii. 190.

lenvoy†, l'envoy, l'envoi (len-voi′; F. pron. loṅ-vwo′), n. [< OF. l'envoy, l'envoi: le, the; envoi, a sending: see *envoy*1.] 1. A sort of postscript appended to a literary composition. See *envoy*1.

> Pag. Is not lenuoy a salue?
> Ar. No, Page, it is an epilogue or discourse, to make plaine
> Some obscure precedence that hath tofore bin faine.
> Shak., L. L. L., iii. 1. 82 (folio 1623).

2†. A conclusion; a result. See *envoy*1.

Lenzites (len-zī′tēz), n. [NL. (Elias Fries, 1838).] A genus of fungi of the order Agaricales. The pileus is sessile, dimidiate in form, and woody or coriaceous; the gills are also coriaceous; and the trama is floccose. The plants are found growing on stumps, etc., and are most abundant in the tropics, where they become woody.

lenzitoid (len-zī′toid), a. [< Lenzites + -oid.] Resembling in form or structure a fungus of the genus Lenzites.

Lenz's law. See *law*1.

Leo (lē′ō), n. [L., a lion; a constellation: see lion.] 1. In astron., an ancient zodiacal constellation, the Lion, containing Regulus, a star of magnitude 1½, and two stars of the second magnitude. It is easily found, for the pointers of the Great Bear point southerly to its brightest star, distant about 45 degrees from the southernmost of them. Four stars in the body of Leo form a characteristic trapezium, and those about the neck and mane make a sickle. It is the fifth sign of the zodiac, its symbol as such being ♌, the origin of which is uncertain. See cut in next column.

2. In zoöl., the technical specific name [l. c.] of the lion, Felis leo, sometimes taken as a generic name [cap.], when the animal is called Leo africanus.—Leo Minor, a constellation between Leo and the Great Bear, first introduced in 1690 by Hevelius.

The Constellation Leo.

leod†, n. A Middle English form of *lede*3.

leof†, a. A Middle English form of lief.

leoht†, a. and n. A Middle English form of *light*1.

leon†, n. A Middle English form of lion.

Leonardesque (lē-ǫ-när-desk′), a. and n. [< Leonardo (see def.) + -esque.] I. a. In art, in the manner of Leonardo or Lionardo da Vinci, an illustrious Florentine artist, engineer, and man of letters (1452–1519).

II. n. A disciple or an imitator of Leonardo da Vinci; sometimes, a picture of the school of Leonardo.

Also Lionardesque.

leonced, a. See lionced.

leoncito (lē-ǫn-sī′tō), n. [A dim. (not in Sp. use) of Sp. león, a lion: see lion.] The lion-monkey of Humboldt, a kind of tamarin or marmoset, Midas leoninus.

Leonese (lē-ǫ-nēs′ or -nēz′), a. and n. [< Sp. Leonés, of Leon, < León, Leon: see def.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the city, province, or ancient kingdom of Leon in Spain, or its inhabitants.

II. n. sing. and pl. A native or an inhabitant, or natives or inhabitants, of the province or city of Leon in Spain.

leonhardite (lē-ǫn-här′dīt), n. [Named after Prof. K. C. von Leonhard of Heidelberg (1779–1862).] A mineral closely related to laumontite, and probably a variety of it, differing only in having lost part of its water.

Leonia (lē-ō′ni-ă), n. [NL. (Ruiz and Pavon, 1799), named after D. Francisco Leon, who promoted the publication of Ruiz and Pavon's "Flora Peruviana et Chilensis."] A genus of South American trees, belonging to the family Violaceæ and tribe Rinoreæ. It is distinguished from Rinorea, the type of the tribe, by having the five petals partly connected, the connective of the stamens not produced, and an indehiscent fruit. There are two species, natives of Brazil and Peru. One, L. glycycarpa, produces a fruit that is eaten by the Peruvians, who call the tree the achocon. This genus was formerly placed in the family Myrsinaceæ, and later made by de Candolle to constitute a family (Leoniaceæ) by itself.

Leoniaceæ (lē-ō-ni-ā′sē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Alphonse de Candolle, 1844), < Leonia + -aceæ.] A family of plants, containing only the anomalous genus Leonia, now referred to the Violaceæ.

Leonid (lē′ō-nid), n. One of the Leonides.

Leonides (lē-ǫn′i-dēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. leo(n-), a lion, the constellation Leo (see lion), + -ides, pl. suffix: see *-id*2, 1.] The meteors which yearly radiate from the "sickle" of Leo about November 15, but with special profusion about once in 33 years. The swarm from which they come follows Tempel's comet of 1866 in its orbit.

★leonine (lē′ō-nin or -nīn), a. and n. [< ME. leonin, < OF. leonin, F. léonin = Sp. Pg. It. leonino, < L. leoninus, belonging to a lion, ML. also belonging to a person named Leo or Leonius or Leoninus (in which sense it is generally supposed to be used as applied to a form of verse (versus leoninus, OF. vers leonins, also leonine, lionime, f. sing.), the person in this case being identified with Leo or Leonius or Leoninus, a canon of the Order of St. Benedict in Paris in the 12th century, or with other persons who are supposed to have invented or used this form of verse; but the adj. so applied is prob. to be taken literally), < leo(n-), a lion: see lion.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to or resembling a lion; lion-like: as, leonine fierceness or rapacity.

> So was he ful of leonyn corage.
> Chaucer, Monk's Tale, l. 656.
>
> We almost see his [Landor's] leonine face and lifted brow. Stedman, Vict. Poets, p. 57.

2. In pros., consisting of metrical Latin hexameters or elegiacs (alternate hexameters and pentameters), in which the final word rimes with the word immediately preceding the cesural pause or the middle of the line. The correspondence of sound between the terminations of the two halves of the pentameter is frequently imperfect, affecting unaccented syllables only, so as not to amount to a perfect rime. Leonine verses were extensively used in the middle ages, even as early as the eighth century. The following Latin version of "The devil was sick," etc., is a leonine elegiac couplet:

"Dæmon lan*guebat*, monachus tunc esse vo*lebat*, Ast ubi conva*luit*, mansit ut ante fuit."

Although classical poets avoided in general the use of rime, yet occasional instances of it can be found in their writings, and sometimes even examples of true leonine verses, such as this from Ovid:

"Quot cœlum stellas, tot habet tua Roma pu*ellas*."

The epithet leonine does not properly apply to other meters than those mentioned, nor to other distributions of rime.

3. [cap.] Pertaining to a person named Leo, particularly to several popes of that name; more specifically, of or pertaining to Leo I., the Great (pope from 440 to 461), who is said to have added certain words to the Roman canon of the mass, and whom some have even, without good reason, described as the author of the Roman liturgy. A Roman sacramentary extant in a manuscript assigned to the eighth century is known as the Leonine Sacramentary.—Leonine City, that part of the city of Rome which is west of the Tiber and north of Trastevere. It contains the Vatican, the Castle of St. Angelo, and the district between (known as the Borgo), and is inclosed within a separate line of walls. It was first fortified by Pope Leo IV. (847–55), whence the name.—Leonine monkey, the Macacus leoninus of Aracan.

II. n. A coin illegally imported into England by foreign merchants in the reign of Edward I. It was made of silver, alloyed, and was intended to circulate with the silver pennies then legally current. Probably so called because its obverse type was a lion.

leoninely (lē′ō-nin-li or -nīn-li), adv. In a leonine manner; like a lion.

Leonist (lē′ō-nist), n. [< ML. Leonista, said to be so named from one Leo, or from the city of Lyons, F. Lyon (< L. Lugdunum), conformed to lion, L. leo(n-), a lion.] A name sometimes used for a member of the religious body known as the Waldenses.

Leontice (lē-on′ti-sē), n. [NL., < L. leontice, the wild chervil, < Gr. λεοντική, a plant also called κακαλία: see Cacalia.] A genus of polypetalous herbs of the family Berberidaceæ. It is characterized by having from 6 to 9 sepals, 6 small spurred petals, 6 stamens, and an indehiscent bladdery capsule. There are about 10 species. They are herbs with tuber-bearing rhizomes.

Leontodon (lē-on′tō-don), n. [NL. (Linnæus), in allusion to the toothed leaves, < Gr. λέων (λεοντ-), a lion, + ὀδούς (ὀδοντ-) = E. tooth.] A genus of plants belonging to the family Cichoriaceæ. It is distinguished by the plumose pappus, naked receptacle, and smooth achenia. There are about 45 species. The common hawk-bit or fall dandelion of the northeastern United States is L. autumnale, a native of Europe, naturalized in the United States. Popularly called lion's-tooth.

Leontopodium (lē-on-tō-pō′di-um), n. [NL. (Robert Brown), < L. leontopodion = Gr. λεοντοπόδιον, a plant, lit. lion's-foot, < λέων (λεοντ-), a lion, + ποῦς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] A small genus of composite plants of the tribe Inuleæ and subtribe Gnaphalinæ. It is closely related to Gnaphalium and was formerly united with it, but is now separated from it on account of the sterile hermaphrodite flowers and undivided style. L. Leontopodium is the edelweiss (which see).

Leonurus (lē-ō-nū′rus), n. [NL. (Linnæus), < Gr. λέων, lion, + οὐρά, tail.] A genus of labiate plants of the tribe Stachydeæ. It is distinguished from Stachys by having the rootlets acutely three-angled at the top instead of rounded. There are 10 species, natives of extratropical Europe and Asia. They are erect herbs with cut leaves, having a close whorl of flowers in their axils. One species, L. Cardiaca, is a common weed called motherwort, naturalized from Europe in the eastern and central parts of the United States.

★leopard (lep′ärd), n. [Early mod. E. also libbard; < ME. lepard, lepart, lipard, leopard, leoperd, leopart, also lebard, lebbard, libard, libart, liberd, lyberde, lybart, etc., = D. luipaard = G. Dan. Sw. leopard, < OF. leopard, leopart, lepart, F. léopard = Pr. leopart, leupart, lupart = Sp. Pg. It. leopardo, < L. leopardus, < Gr. λεόπαρδος, λεοντόπαρδος, a leopard, < λέων (λεοντ-), a lion, + πάρδος, a pard: see lion and pard[1].] 1. The pard or panther, Felis pardus, the largest spotted cat of the Old World. It ranks third in size, strength, and ferocity among the Old World Felidæ, being exceeded only by the lion and tiger; but it is also inferior to the jaguar and cougar of America. The Himalayan ounce, Felis irbis, is about equal to it in size. A good-sized leopard is about 4 feet long without the tail, which is about 3 feet. The skull measures 9 inches in length by 5¼ in breadth. The color is tawny, paler or whitish below, and nearly everywhere regularly and profusely spotted with black or blackish, the largest of these spots being ocellated or broken into rosettes. But the animal varies not less in color than in size. Some individuals are black, though even in these cases of melanism the characteristic studded pattern of coloration may be traced. The leopard is smooth-haired, without mane or beard, agile as well as sturdy, and of somewhat arboreal habits, like the jaguar and cougar. It inhabits wooded country throughout Africa and across Asia to Japan, Java, and some of the other islands, in this wide range running into many geographical varieties.

It fortuned Belphebe with her peares,
The woody Nimphs, and with that lovely boy,
Was hunting then the Libbards and the Beares.
Spenser, F. Q., IV. vii. 23.

Her foot on one
Of those tame leopards. Kitten-like he roll'd
And paw'd about her sandal. Tennyson, Princess, iii.

2. In her., originally, a lion passant gardant. Thus, the three lions on the shield of England as it existed in the reign of Henry III. are spoken of as leopards. In later heraldry an attempt has been made to discriminate between the lion and the leopard, but the only tenable distinction is when the leopard is represented spotted, which is common in modern heraldry. The practical identity of the two bearings is shown in this, that a leopard rampant is said to be a leopard lionné, and a lion passant gardant is said to be a lion leopardé.

3. A gold coin, weighing from about 53 to 69 grains, struck by Edward III. and Edward the Black Prince of England, for circulation in France, and having on the obverse a lion passant gardant. In French heraldry this representation is described as a lion léopardé, whence the name of the coin.—American leopard, the jaguar, Felis onca.—Black leopard. See def. 1.—Hunting leopard. See hunting-leopard.—Snow-leopard, the ounce, Felis irbis.

leopard-cat (lep′ärd-kat), n. 1. The American ocelot, Felis pardalis.—2. A wild cat of India, Ceylon, Java, and Sumatra, Felis bengalensis, about 3 feet long including the tail, of a tawny color, white below, striped on the head and back, spotted on the sides.

leopardé (lep-ärd′dā′), a. [Heraldic F., < léopard + -é, E. -ed[1].] In her., passant gardant: said of a lion. See leopard, 2.

leopardess (lep′ärd-des), n. [< leopard + -ess.] A female leopard.

leopard-fish (lep′ärd-fish), n. The lesser wolf-fish, Anarrhichas minor, of the North Atlantic.

leopard-flower (lep′ärd-flou″ėr), n. A garden-flower from China and Japan, Belamcanda Chinensis, of the iris family. The perianth is spotted with purple, and the fruited receptacle resembles a blackberry, whence the plant is also called blackberry-lily.

leopard-frog (lep′ärd-frog), n. The American shad-frog, Rana halecina: so called from its spotted coloration.

leopard-lily (lep′ärd-lil″i), n. A spotted variety of the liliaceous plant Lachenalia pendula, from the Cape of Good Hope.

leopard-moth (lep′ärd-môth), n. A large black and white spotted moth of the family Cossidæ (Zeuzera pyrina or Z. æsculi), common throughout Europe and about New York City. The larva bores in the trunks of the elm, apple, pear, and plum.

leopard's-bane (lep′ärdz-bān), n. 1. A plant of the genus Doronicum.—2. A medicinal plant, Arnica montana. Called also mountain-tobacco.—3. Same as herb-paris.

leopard-seal (lep′ärd-sēl), n. A large spotted seal, Ogmorhinus or Hydrurga leptonyx, of the family Phocidæ and subfamily Monachinæ, inhabiting Patagonia. Also called sea-leopard.

leopard-tortoise (lep′ärd-tôr″tis), n. A tortoise, Testudo pardalis, of Africa.

Leopardus (lē-ō-pär′dus), n. [L., a leopard; see leopard.] A classic name of the leopard, pard, or panther, sometimes used in zoölogy as a generic name of the large spotted cats.

leopard-wood (lep′ärd-wůd), n. The wood of Piratinera Guianensis. It is mottled with dark blotches, giving a fancied resemblance to the skin of a leopard. Also called snake-wood and letter-wood.

leopart†, n. A Middle English form of leopard.

Leopoldinia (lē″ō-pōl-din′i-ä), n. [NL. (Martius, 1824), dedicated to the Empress Leopoldine, wife of Dom Pedro I., Emperor of Brazil.] A genus of Brazilian palms of the tribe Arecæ and subtribe Geonomeæ. The four species inhabit the northern parts of Brazil. They are ornamental in cultivation and have various economic uses. L. Piassaba is one of the bast-palms which yield the piassaba-fiber.

leor†, n. A Middle English form of leer[1].

leorn†, v. A Middle English form of learn.

leose†, v. t. A Middle English form of leese[1].

lept. An obsolete strong preterit of leap[1]. Chaucer.

Lepadicea (lep-ą-dis′ē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Lepas (Lepad-) + -icea.] In De Blainville's classification (1825), one of two families of his Nematopoda (the other being Balanoidea), containing the cirripeds of the genera Lepas, Gymnolepas, Pentalepas, Polylepas, and Litholepas.

Lepadidæ (le-pad′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lepas (Lepad-) + -idæ.] A family of stalked thoracic cirripeds, typified by the genus Lepas, belonging to the order Thoracica of the subclass Cirripedia; the goose-mussels or barnacles. These crustaceans are free when larval, fixed to submerged objects when adult. Fixture is effected by the modification of the antennæ into a flexible fleshy peduncle, sometimes very short, and sometimes a foot in length. This supports the hard calcareous shell or capitulum, normally of five valves, compressed to a flattened form, whose two sides are drawn together by a single transverse muscle. From the opening between the sides are protruded the long, slender, curved, and jointed legs resembling tentacles, which move at will with a sweeping motion. On each side of the body are several filamentous appendages, homologous with the gills of higher crustaceans and supposed to have a respiratory function. The alimentary canal is comparatively simple; there are three pairs of delicate mouth-parts; there is no heart or large blood-vessels. The Lepadidæ are mostly hermaphrodite, but in some species the animal of the normal form is strictly male, having one or more males of minute size and more simple organization lodged inside its shell. In others, which, though hermaphrodite, have the male organs less developed than the female, similar males are met with, and are termed complemental males.

disk divided into two portions, the posterior of which has a free anterior margin. By means of this organ the fish attaches itself to stones and other objects, and is hence known as sucker. Several species occur in European seas; the most common are L. gouani and L. bimaculatus. Erroneously written Lepidogaster (Yarrell, 1841) and Lepadogasterus (Gouan, 1770).

lepadoid (lep′ą-doid), a. and n. [< Gr. λεπάς (λεπαδ-), a limpet (see Lepas), + εἶδος, shape.]

I. a. Resembling a goose-mussel; of or pertaining to the Lepadidæ.

II. n. A member of the Lepadidæ.

lepal (lē′pal), n. [< NL. as if lepalum*, < L. lepis, < Gr. λεπίς, a scale: the term conforms to that of petal, sepal.] In bot., a barren transformed stamen.

leparte, n. An obsolete variant of leopard. Chaucer.

Lepas (lē′pas), n. [NL., < L. lepas (lepad-), < Gr. λεπάς (λεπαδ-), a limpet, < λέπας, a bare rock, < λέπειν, strip, peel.] The typical genus of Lepadidæ; goose-mussels proper. L. anatifera is a common species, usually found attached to floating or submerged objects, hanging in the water sometimes to the length of a foot or more. L. fascicularis is another well-known species, with a short footstalk. See barnacle[1], 2.

lepe, v. A Middle English form of leap.

Lepechinia (lep-e-kin′i-ạ), n. [NL. (Willdenow, 1806), named after John Lepechin, a Russian botanist.] A genus of labiate plants constituting the tribe Lepechinieæ. It is characterized by a slightly two-lipped calyx and corolla, the latter with broad, more or less flat lobes and naked within, and by four perfect stamens with oblong parallel anther-cells. There are three or four species, natives of Mexico, herbs with small yellowish or white flowers in axillary whorls crowded in dense terminal spikes.

Lepechinieæ (lep″e-ki-nī′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1876), < Lepechinia + -eæ.] A tribe of labiate plants containing the genus Lepechinia only, which see.

2. A person affected with leprosy.

> And, behold, there came a leper and worshiped him, saying, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. Mat. viii. 2.

leper[2]†, n. An obsolete form of leaper. Piers Plowman.

leper-house (lep′ėr-hous), n. A hospital for the treatment of leprosy.

leperize† (lep′ėr-īz), v. t. [< leper[1] + -ize.] To strike with leprosy.

> Moses by Faith, doth Myriam leperize.
> Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Triumph of Faith, iiii. 7.

leperous (lep′ėr-us), a. See leprous.

lepid (lep′id), a. [= Sp. lépido = Pg. It. lepido, < L. lepidus, pleasant; cf. L. lepor, lepos (lepor-), pleasantness; no verb-root appears.] Pleasant; jocose. [Rare.]

> As for the joyous and lepid consul, he gives himself no trouble upon any subject.
> Sydney Smith, Peter Plymley's Letters, vii.

lepides, n. Plural of lepis.

Lepidineæ (lep-i-din′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1821), < Lepidium + -ineæ.] A tribe of cruciferous plants. The tribe embraced 25 genera, of which Lepidium was the type. It is now mostly included in the tribe Sinapeæ.

lepidity†, n. [< lepid + -ity.] Pleasantness; wittiness. Bailey, 1731.

Lepidium (lē-pid′i-um), n. [NL. (Linnæus), < L. lepidium, < Gr. λεπίδιον, a plant, prob. garden-cress, pepperwort, also lit. a small scale, dim. of λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale: see lepis.] 1. A large genus of cruciferous plants, chiefly herbs, of the tribe Sinapeæ, distinguished by the dehiscent pod, which is almost always two-seeded, and by the white flowers. About 100 species have been enumerated, which may be reduced to about 65, distributed over the warm regions of the world. They are commonly known as peppergrasses.

2†. In zoöl., a genus of thysanurous insects. Also written Lepidion. Menge, 1854.

lepidly† (lep′id-li), adv. [< lepid + -ly[2].] Wittily; pleasantly.

lepidocrocite (lep-i-dok′rō-sīt), n. [< Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale (see lepis), + κρόκος, crocus, + -ite[2].] A variety of goethite occurring in columnar forms with a scaly or fibrous structure.

lepidodendroid (lep″i-dō-den′droid), a. [< Lepidodendron + -oid.] Like plants of the genus Lepidodendron; having a scaly bark.

Lepidodendron (lep″i-dō-den′dron), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + δένδρον, a tree.] A common fossil plant of the Carboniferous coal-measures, supposed, in some cases at least, to have furnished an important constituent of the coal itself. By most fossil botanists Lepidodendron is considered to be closely allied to the club-mosses (Lycopodiaceæ), now widely spread plants. The fossil club-mosses are, however, not identical in structure or external appearance with any now living, one important difference being the much larger size of the fossil forms. The surface of the stem of Lepidodendron is marked by peculiar, prominent, quincunxially arranged, and generally lozenge-shaped "leaf-cushions" (also called "bolsters" and "leaf-bases"), which are sometimes distinctly separated from each other, and sometimes confluent above and below, and which vary greatly in size and shape with the age of the plant to which they belong. The leaf-scars are also usually rhombic (sometimes heart-shaped), and are situated on the upper or central part of the cushion, and marked with punctate impressions or scars, which are usually three in number, the middle one being the vascular cicatrix. The young twigs were clothed with long narrow leaves. The internal structure of the plant varies considerably with the species, of which great numbers have been described, based chiefly on the differences in the features of the leaf-cushions and -scars. Several species reveal a relatively thick exogenous woody zone enveloping the primary or endogenous wood. The fossil Lepidodendra are chiefly casts of the exterior. These plants are very characteristic of the middle and lower divisions of the productive (Carboniferous) coal-measures, and are widely distributed over the world. One species of Lepidodendron (L. corrugatum Dawson) is very characteristic of the Lower Carboniferous in America. In Europe this genus is especially developed in the lower parts of the coal-measures. See Sigillaria.

Lepidodendron Brittsii, from the coal-measures of Missouri. a, a group of four leaf-scars; b, one of the scars on a larger scale.

lepidoganoid (lep″i-dō-gan′oid), a. and n. [< Lepidoganoidei, q. v.] I. a. Pertaining to or having the characters of the Lepidoganoidei.

II. n. A fish of the group Lepidoganoidei.

lepidoganoidean (lep″i-dō-ga-noi′dē-ạn), a. and n. Same as lepidoganoid.

Lepidoganoidei (lep″i-dō-ga-noi′dē-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + NL. ganoideus, ganoid: see ganoid.] In R. Owen's systems, an order or a suborder of ganoid fishes with regular scales instead of plates, as in the Placoganoidei. It is an artificial group, represented by the living amiids, lepidosteids, and polypterids, with many extinct relatives. In one of Owen's systems the Lepidoganoidei are the second suborder of the third order, Ganoidei, of fishes; in another, the first suborder of the eighth order, Ganoidei, divided into 8 families. The Lepidoganoidei as an order are sometimes divided into 5 suborders or families, Amiidæ, Lepidosteidæ, Lepidopleuridæ, Crossopterygidæ, and Acanthodidæ. It is now obsolete.

lepidoid (lep′i-doid), a. and n. [< Lepidoidei, q. v.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Lepidoidei: as, a lepidoid fish; a lepidoid scale.

II. n. A member of the Lepidoidei.

Lepidoidei (lep-i-doi′dē-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λεπιδοειδής, scale-like, < λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + εἶδος, form.] In Agassiz's classification (1833), a family of fossil ganoid fishes covered with large flat rhomboid enameled scales. It included forms now referred to several different families, as Acanthodidæ, Dipteridæ, Palæoniseidæ, etc.

lepidolite (lep′i-dō-līt), n. [< Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + λίθος, a stone.] Lithia mica. This mineral is found in scaly masses, ordinarily of a violet or lilac color and containing a small percentage of lithia. It is often associated with the lithia tourmalin or rubellite, as at Rozena in Moravia, and Paris, Maine. See mica.

lepidomelane (lep′i-dō-me-lān″), n. [< Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + μέλας (μελαν-), black.] A species of the mica group (see mica), of a deep-black color, usually occurring in small, rather inelastic scales. It contains a large amount of iron.

lepidophæite (lep″i-dō-fē′īt), n. [< Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + φαιός, dusky, + -ite[2].] A soft, scaly variety of wad containing copper.

Lepidophloios (lep″i-dō-flō′os), n. [NL. (Sternberg, 1825); prop. Lepidophlœus*, < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + φλοιός, bark.] A genus of fossil plants of the coal-measures, closely related to Lepidodendron, with prominent (often very prominent) transverse rhombic leaf-cushions, each of which exhibits a transversely elongated rhombic or slightly crescentic scar containing three small punctate scars, the central or vascular one being the largest and triangular. This genus is found in various parts of Europe, the United States, and Canada.

Lepidophyllum (lep″i-dō-fil′um), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + φύλλον, leaf.] A name proposed by Brongniart in 1828 for the scales or bracts of the fructification or strobiles of Lepidodendron and Lepidophloios, fossil plants of the coal-measures. Though commonly used in this sense, it is antedated by Glossopteris (which see). See also Lepidostrobus.

Lepidopodidæ (lep″i-dō-pod′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lepidopus (-pod-) + -idæ.] A family of acanthopterygian fishes, typified by the genus Lepidopus, embracing scombroids of very elongate compressed form, and with a distinctly developed caudal fin. It includes several deep- and open-sea fishes.

lepidopter (lep-i-dop′tėr), n. [< NL. lepidopterus, scaly-winged: see lepidopterous.] A lepidopterous insect. Also lepidopteran.

Lepidoptera (lep-i-dop′tę-rạ), n. pl. [NL., neut. pl. of lepidopterus, scaly-winged: see lepidopterous.] An order of hexapod insects, or true Insecta, with suctorial mouth-parts in the form of a spiral antlia, four similar membranous wings completely covered with scales, a fused prothorax, and perfect metamorphosis. These beautiful insects are known as butterflies and moths, the former being the Lepidoptera diurna, or Rhopalocera, and the latter the Lepidoptera nocturna, or Heterocera, respectively constituting the two suborders into which the order is now usually divided. In the adults the mouth is completely haustellate or antliate, the maxillæ being modified into a tubular sucking-proboscis, and the mandibles being rudimentary. The modified maxillæ have a pair of palps. The head is loosely attached to the thorax, and the long slender legs are very freely movable. The fore pair are rudimentary in some butterflies. The body is hairy; the prothorax has a pair of tippets or patagia, and the mesothorax a pair of scales, tegulæ, or patagia. The pupa is obtected. The larva, known as a caterpillar, is mandibulate, having masticatory instead of suctorial mouth-parts, and is provided with from 4 to 10 prolegs or prop-legs besides the 6 true legs. The lip of the larva bears a double-orificed spinneret, a tubular organ through which passes the silk of which the cocoon is fabricated. Caterpillars are almost invariably vegetable-feeders, and often prove highly destructive. A few species are known to be carnivorous. Upward of 50,000 species are described. In the Linnean system, prior to 1758, the Lepidoptera consisted of the two genera Papilio and Phalæna, corresponding to the modern suborders Rhopalocera and Heterocera, or butterflies and moths; later, in the same system, of the genera Papilio, Sphinx, and Phalæna, corresponding to the Latreillean Lepidoptera diurna, crepuscularia, and nocturna. Later writers divided the order into the families Papilionidæ, Sphingidæ, Ægeriidæ, Zygænidæ, Bombycidæ, Noctuidæ, Geometridæ, Pyralidæ, Tortricidæ, and Tineidæ; and nearly all of these have been further subdivided into other families.

Lepidoptera.

1. Butterfly—Hipparchia galathea, marbled white butterfly. 2. Hawk-moth or sphinx—Macroglossa stellatarum, humming-bird hawk-moth. 3. Moth—Abraxas grossulariata, magpie-moth. 4. Palpi and spiral mouth of butterfly. 5. Antennæ—a, butterfly's; b, sphinx's; c, moth's. 6. Portion of wing of cabbage-butterfly, with part of the scales removed. 7. Scales of same, magnified.

lepidopteran (lep-i-dop′tę-ran), a. and n. [As lepidopter-ous + -an.] I. a. Same as lepidopterous.

II. n. Same as lepidopter.

lepidopterist (lep-i-dop′tę-rist), n. [< Lepidoptera + -ist.] One who is versed or engaged in the scientific study of Lepidoptera.

lepidopterous (lep-i-dop′tę-rus), a. [< NL. lepidopterus, scaly-winged, < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + πτερόν, a wing.] In entom., having scaly wings; specifically, pertaining to the Lepidoptera, or having their characters. Also lepidopteral, lepidopteran.

Lepidopus (le-pid′ō-pus), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] 1. In ichth., the typical genus of Lepidopodidæ, having scale-like appendages in the place of ventral fins, whence the name. L. caudatus, of a silvery color, is the true scabbard-fish, a species of wide distribution in many seas.

2. A genus of crustaceans. Dana, 1847

Lepidosauria (lep″i-dō-sâ′ri-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + σαῦρος, a lizard.] In some systems, a subclass or suborder of Reptilia, including reptiles with scales and plates, with limbs or without, and with the anal cleft transverse and the penis double. The group includes the ophidians and lacertilians, but not the crocodilians nor chelonians. Also called Plagiotremata and Squamata.

lepidosaurian (lep″i-dō-sâ′ri-an), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Lepidosauria, or having their characters.

II. n. One of the Lepidosauria.

Lepidosiren (lep″i-dō-sī″ren), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale (see lepis), + NL. Siren, a genus of amphibians.] 1. A genus of dipnoan fishes, typical of the family Lepidosirenidæ and subfamily Lepidosireninæ, of an elongate form, as in the amphibian genus Siren, but with a scaly body. Formerly the Protopterus annectens of Africa was included in this genus, and the name lepidosiren is still loosely applied to that fish, though it is more properly restricted to the South American form for which the genus was originally instituted. L. paradoxa is the South American mudfish, about 3 feet long, found in the Amazon. Amphibichthys is a synonym.

Skull of Mudfish (Lepidosiren annectens), side views, the upper in longitudinal vertical section. (Cartilage dotted; membranes and bones shaded in lines.)

A, parieto-frontal bone; As, alisphenoid; Au, auditory chamber; B, superorbital; Br, branchiostegal rays; C, nasal; D, palato-pteryguid; E, vomerine teeth; EO, exoccipital bone; Eth, ethmoid; Hy, hyoid; L, lacrymal; Mn, mandible; N, nasal sac; Op, opercular plate; Or, orbit; PS, cartilaginous presphenoidal region; Vo, vomer; a, quadrato-mandibular articulation; ch, notochord; x x, parasphenoid; y, pharyngo-branchial; II, V, VIII, exits of optic, trigeminal, and vagus nerves; 1, 2, first and second vertebræ.

2. [l. c.] A member of this genus.

Lepidosirenidea (lep″i-dō-sī-re-nid′ē-ä), n. pl. [NL., < Lepidosiren + -idea.] An order referred by Melville to the amphibians: same as Sirenoidea.

lepidosirenoid (lep″i-dō-sī′re-noid), a. and n. [< Lepidosiren + -oid.] I. a. Pertaining to the Lepidosirenidæ, or having their characters.

★ II. n. A fish of the family Lepidosirenidæ.

lepidosis† (lep-i-dō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + -osis.] In med., scaly disease: applied to ichthyosis, psoriasis, and pityriasis.

Lepidosperma (lep″i-dō-spėr′mä), n. [NL. (La Billardière, 1804), < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + σπέρμα, seed.] A genus of sedges of the tribe Rhynchosporeæ, distinguished by having subdistichous glumes and hard croded seeds. There are about 40 species, inhabiting Australia, New Zealand, the Malay archipelago, and southern China. L. gladiatum, the sword sedge of the sea-coast of extratropical Australia, is an important plant for binding sea-sand, and also yields a paper-material said to be as good as esparto.

Lepidostei (lep-i-dos′tē-ī), n. pl. [NL., pl. of Lepidosteus.] A group of ganoid fishes, founded by Agassiz in 1833: same as Lepidoidei.

lepidosteid (lep-i-dos′tē-id), n. A fish of the family Lepidosteidæ. Also lepidosteoid.

Lepidosteidæ (lep″i-dos-tē′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lepidosteus + -idæ.] 1. A family of rhombiganoid fishes. They have lozenge-shaped scales, and fins with fulcra. The dorsal and anal fins are placed far back, close to the caudal. The abdominal part of the spinal column is longer than the caudal part. Opercular gills or pseudobranchiæ are present. The Lepidosteidæ are characteristic of the fresh waters of North America, and are popularly known as garfishes, garpikes, bony pikes, and alligator-gars. They are noteworthy for many anatomical peculiarities, and as being the only living representatives of a once large and widely diffused order of fishes. One species has been reported from China.

2. In Huxley's and Zittel's systems, a suborder or order of ganoid fishes, containing the above family, then called Lepidosteini or Ginglymodi.

lepidosteoid (lep-i-dos′tē-oid), a. and n. [NL., < Lepidosteoidei.] I. a. Pertaining to the Lepidosteidæ, or having their characters.

II. n. Same as lepidosteid.

Lepidosteoidei (lep-i-dos-tē-oi′dē-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Lepidosteus + Gr. εἶδος, form.] In Günther's system, a suborder of ganoid fishes having rhombic scales, generally fulcrate fins, numerous branchiostegals, and no gular plate. It embraces the Lepidosteidæ and numerous extinct forms.

Lepidosteus (lep-i-dos′tē-us), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπις (λεπιδ-), a scale, + ὀστέον, a bone.] A genus of fishes with rhomboid scales as hard as bone, whence the name. The genus includes the North American garpikes or bony pikes, as L. osseus, the common long-nosed, and L. platystomus, the short-nosed garpike. The alligator-gar, L. tristœchus, represents a section of the genus called Atractosteus. The genus is typical of the family Lepidosteidæ. Originally spelled Lepisosteus (Lacépède, 1803).

Lepidostrobus (lep-i-dos′trō-bus), n.; pl. Lepidostrobi (-bī). [NL. (Brongniart, 1828), < Gr. λεπις (λεπιδ-), a scale, + στρόβος, a twisting or whirling round: see strobile.] A generic name applied to the fruit-cones of Lepidodendron and Lepidophloios. They correspond closely in structure with the fertile spike of the living Lepidophloios macrolepidotus.

(From Weiss's "Flora der Steinkohlenformation.")

Lepidostrobus hastatus: a, an entire strobile; b, a single scale.

Selaginella. The spore-bearing leaves are attached to a central axis in a crowded spiral arrangement, and their outer ends curve over so as to form an imbricated, diagonally arranged pattern.

lepidote (lep′i-dōt), a. [< Gr. λεπιδωτός, scaly, < λεπιδοῦν, make scaly, < λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale: see lepis.] In bot., covered with scurfy scales or scaly spots; leprous.

lepidoted (lep′i-dō-ted), a. [< lepidote + *-ed*².] Same as lepidote.

Lepidurus (lep-i-dū′rus), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + οὐρά, a tail.] A genus of phyllopods of the family Apodidæ (or Apusidæ), related to Apus, but having a spatulate telson; the spoontails. L. couesi is a species abounding in pools in Montana, Utah, and elsewhere.

Lepidurus couesi.

Lepiopomus (lep″i-ō-pō′mus), n. [NL., also Lepomus, prop. Lepidopomus*; < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + πῶμα, a lid, cover.] Same as Lepomis.

lepis (lē′pis), n.; pl. lepides (lep′i-dēz). [NL., < L. lepis, < Gr. λεπίς, a scale, rind, husk, flake, < λέπειν, peel, strip. Cf. Lepas.] 1. A scale, as that of a fish.—2. In bot., a thin flat membranous process or scale, attached by its middle, and having a lacerated irregular margin, such as covers the foliage of the oleaster.

Lepisma (le-pis′mä), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1748), < Gr. λέπισμα, that which is peeled off, peel, < λεπίζειν, peel, husk, < λεπίς, a scale, husk: see lepis.] The typical genus of Lepismatidæ, having three long and four short caudal filaments, very long antennæ, and the body flat and scaly. Several species of these bristletails occur about houses in warm or damp places, where they may be seen running swiftly when disturbed. In their movements and general habits they resemble cockroaches. L. saccharina is a common household pest in Europe and America, in damp, close rooms. L. domestica, the fishtail, is another household pest. L. quadriseriata is commonly observed on the walls of out-houses. In the United States these insects are commonly called fishtail, silvertail, and silverfish. They are fond of the glazed figures in wall-paper, of photographs, the paste of book-bindings, etc., and also injure silks and silk tapestries. They are most abundant where it is a little damp.

Lepismatidæ (lep-is-mat′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lepisma(t-) + -idæ.] A family of genuine thysanurous insects of the suborder Cinura, having long caudal stylets or filamentous appendages, long filamentous antennæ, well-developed jaws and long palps, six legs, slender cylindric or flattened body covered with metallic scales, and ten-jointed abdomen; the bristletails proper. They are found running swiftly about buildings, under stones, etc., and somewhat resemble cockroaches, though not nearly related to these orthopterous insects. Lepisma, Lepismina, and Machilis are the representative genera. Also Lepismidæ.

Lepistemon (lep-i-stē′mon), n. [NL. (C. L. Blume, 1826), < Gr. λεπίς, a scale, + στήμων, a stamen.] A genus of convolvulaceous plants of the tribe Convolvuleæ, distinguished from Ipomœa by the dilatation of the base of the filaments into small arched scales. There are 4 species, having cordate three-lobed leaves and small yellowish flowers, all twining herbs, natives of tropical Asia, Africa, and Australia.

Lepistemoneæ (lep″is-tē-mō′nē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Miquel, 1856), < Lepistemon + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the order Convolvulaceæ, established for the reception of the genus Lepistemon.

lepocyta (le-pos′i-tä), n. [NL.: see lepocyte.] An infusorian with a cell-membrane: distinguished from gymnocyta.

lepocyte (lep′ō-sīt), n. [< NL. lepocyta, < Gr. λέπος, a scale, husk, + κύτος, a hollow, a cavity: see cyte.] A nucleated cell with a cell-wall: distinguished from gymnocyte.

Lepomis (le-pō′mis), n. [NL. (Rafinesque, 1819), also Lepomus, emend. Lepiopomus (Jordan, 1878), prop. Lepidopoma*; < Gr. λεπίς (λεπιδ-), a scale, + πῶμα, a lid, cover.] A genus of sunfishes of American fresh waters, having the operculum ending behind in a convex black flap, sometimes highly developed. They belong to the family Centrarchidæ, and are nearly related to the black-bass. Upward of 20 species are described, some of them among the commonest and most familiar fishes of the United States, often called bream, as the blue or copper-nosed, L. pallidus. The common sunfish, sunny, or pumpkin-seed is L. gibbosus, found from Maine to Florida and in the Great Lake region. The red-spotted sunfish is L. humilis, found from Kentucky to Kansas and Texas. L. cyanellus of the Great Lake region and thence to Mexico is the blue-spotted sunfish or redeye. The two species in which the gill-flap is most highly developed are L. auritus and L. megalotis, both called long-eared sunfish.

Leporidæ (le-por′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Lepus (Lepor-) + -idæ.] A family of mammals of the order Rodentia or Glires and suborder Duplicidentata; the hares. The Leporidæ, together with the Ochotonidæ, compose the suborder. The dental formula of Leporidæ is: 2 incisors above and 1 below in each half-jaw, no canines, 3 premolars in each upper and 2 in each lower half-jaw, and 3 molars above and below in each half-jaw—in all, 28. The milk-dentition is: i. $\frac{2}{1}$, pm. $\frac{2}{1}$ = $\frac{6}{2}$ × 2 = 18. There are in the adult 2 pairs, and in the young 3 pairs, of upper front teeth, the largest number found in this order. The grinders are all alike rootless and mostly trilaminate; the skull is large, and noted for its many vacuities or fontanelles among the bones; clavicles are present, but rudimentary; the scapula has a metacromion; the tibia and fibula are united as in murine rodents; the radius and ulna are complete, but fixed; and the spinal column is remarkably long in the lumbar region. The hind limbs are disproportionately long, and the gait is more or less saltatorial. The hind as well as the fore feet are entirely furry, and the whole length of the metatarsus may be applied to the ground. There are 5 digits on the fore feet, 4 on the hind. The head is full and globose, with very long ears, large eyes, and prominent, mobile, cleft upper lip; there are no cheek-pouches, and the inside of the mouth is partly furry. The tail is short and habitually recurved. The male organs are external; the uterus is two-horned, and the mammæ are numerous—about 5 pairs. There are two living genera, Lepus and Romerolagus, and extinct genera, as Palæolagus, Panolax, and Praotherium. See *hare*¹, rabbit.

Skull of Arctic Hare (Lepus timidus, var. arcticus), from specimen in United States National Museum, Washington.

leporide (lep′ō-rid), n. [< L. lepus (lepor-), a hare (see Lepus), + E. *-ide*².] A variety of the domesticated rabbit, alleged to be a hybrid between the rabbit (Lepus cuniculus) and the hare (L. timidus).

Many of these animals were sold as leporides or hybrids, produced by the union of the hare and rabbit; but the most careful experimenters have failed to produce any such hybrid. Encyc. Brit., XX. 193.

leporiform (lep′ō-ri-fôrm), a. [< L. lepus (lepor-), a hare, + forma, form.] Shaped like a hare; ★resembling a leporide in form; lagomorphic.

leporine (lep′ō-rin or -rīn), a. [= OF. leporin, < L. leporinus, of a hare, < lepus (lepor-), a hare: see Lepus.] Pertaining to a hare; having the nature or qualities of the hare; lagomorphic.

lepothrix (lep′ō-thriks), n. [NL., < Gr. λέπος, a scale, husk, + θρίξ, hair.] A scaly disease of the hair of the axilla or scrotum, due to the presence of a fungous growth beneath the cuticle of the hair.

lepped (lept). An obsolete or dialectal (Irish) past participle of *leap*¹. Spenser.

lepra (lep′rä), n. [L., < Gr. λέπρα, leprosy: see *leper*¹, lepry.] 1. In pathol., a chronic and almost uniformly incurable disease, caused by a well-determined bacillus, Bacillus leprœ. It is characterized anatomically by the formation of nodules and diffuse masses of leprous tissue, distributed especially to the skin and along the nerves, but occurring elsewhere. Lepra begins slowly and haltingly with the ordinary signs of feeble health, and develops into one or the other of the two recognized types of the disease, or into a mixed form. In one type, lepra cutanea or lepra tuberculosa, the skin and mucous membranes are the principal places of deposit of leprous tissue, and there is formation of nodules, indolent ulcers, and cicatrices. The other form, lepra nervorum or lepra anæsthetica, in which the nerves are principally affected, is characterized by pains and anæsthesia in various nerve-regions (the motor paralysis being remarkably scanty), and by various dystrophies consequent upon the nervous lesions, bullous eruptions, spots of pigmentary surplus or deficit, glossy skin, muscular atrophy, and the loss of fingers and toes. Patients with lepra nervorum seem to live longer than those with lepra cutanea. Lepra is unknown among brutes. It is communicated from man to man, but seems usually to require extreme intimacy of association. Lepra has been prevalent in almost all countries of the world. At present it is frequent in many parts of Asia and Africa, and in some of the islands of the Pacific and Indian oceans. In Europe it occurs in Scandinavia, in Finland, in Iceland, and there is some in Spain. It prevails in many parts of South America, Central America, and Mexico, and in a number of the West Indian islands. In America north of Mexico there are some points of prevalence in the southern part of the United States, some among the Chinese of the western coast, and some among the Scandinavian immigrants of the northwest. There are also some infected localities in New Brunswick, in Cape Breton, and in Greenland. Lepra cutanea is also called lepra Arabum, elephantiasis or elephantiasis Græcorum, and leprosy. Lepra nervorum is also called lepra nervosa, lepra mutilans, dry leprosy, joint-evil, and non-tuberculated lepra.

2. One of a class of scaly skin-affections, mostly psoriasis; lepra Græcorum. [Obsolescent.]—3. In bot., a scurfy or mealy matter on the surface of some plants.

Lepralia (le-prā'li-ạ), n. [NL. (Johnston), < Gr. λεπρός, scaly: see leper[1].] 1. A notable genus of chilostomatous polyzoans, of the family Escharidæ or Membraniporidæ, of irregularly branched form with broad flattened divisions. L. pertusa is an Adriatic species.—2. [l. c.] A species of Lepralia. P. P. Carpenter.

lepralian (le-prā'li-ạn), a. [< Lepralia + -an.] Pertaining to the genus Lepralia, or having its characters.

leprarioid (le-prā'ri-oid), a. [< NL. Lepraria (< Gr. λέπρα, leprosy) + -oid.] Resembling certain crustaceous pseudolichens of a dust-like or leprose character, formerly considered to compose a genus Lepraria of Acharius.

leprechawn, leprecawn (lep'rē-kân), n. [Also leprechaun, leprachawn, luprachaun, etc.; ult. < Ir. luchorpan, lucharban, lucharman, a pygmy sprite (see def.), lit. 'a little body,' < lu, little, small, + corpan, dim. of corp, < L. corpus, body: see corpus, corpse. Cf. Gael. lucharmunn, a pygmy, a dwarf, given as < luch, a mouse, + armunn, a hero, chief, but prob. a form of the Ir. word. The present form of the Anglicized name comes rather < Ir. leithbhragan, another name of the same fairy, appar. altered from the earlier name by popular etymology, as if < leit, half, + brōg, shoe, + an, a man, this name being accompanied by the legend that the fairy spends his time in mending a single shoe (half a pair).] In Irish superstition, a pygmy sprite, supposed to grind meal, make shoes, and do other services for persons who treat him well, and, if spellbound by a fixed gaze, to give up an inexhaustible fairy purse.

The Ghosts, Giants, Pookas, Demons, Leprecawns, Banshees, Fairies, Witches, Widows, Old Maids and Other Marvels of the Emerald Isle.

leprey†, leprie†, n. See lepry.

lepric (lep'rik), a. [< Gr. λεπρικός, of or for leprosy, < λέπρα, leprosy: see lepra, leper[1].] Of or pertaining to leprosy. Thomas, Med. Dict.

leprosarium (lep-rō-sā'ri-um), n.; pl. leprosaria (-ạ). [ML.: see leprosery.] A hospital for the treatment of leprosy.

leprose (lep'rōs), a. [< LL. leprosus, leprous: see leprous.] In bot., scale-like or scurf-like: said of some crustaceous lichens whose thallus adheres to trees or stones like a scurf; lepidote.

leprosery (lep'rō-se-ri), n.; pl. leproseries (-riz). [< OF. leproserie, F. léproserie, < ML. leprosaria, leprosarium, a hospital for lepers, < LL. leprosus, leprous: see leprous.] A hospital or home for lepers. N. Y. Med. Jour., XL. 275.

leprosied (lep'rō-sid), a. [< leprosy + -ed[2].] Affected with leprosy.

leprosity (le-pros'i-ti), n. [= OF. leprosite, < ML. leprosita(t-)s, leprousness, < LL. leprosus, leprous: see leprous.] 1. The state of being leprous; leprousness.—2†. A scaly condition.

For to say that Nature hath an intention to make all metals gold, and that, if the crudities, impurities, and leprosities of metals were cured, they would become gold—all these are but dreames. Bacon, Nat. Hist., § 326.

leprosy (lep'rō-si), n. [Formerly also leprosie; < OF. leprosie, leprosy, < ML. leprosia (found only in sense of 'a hospital for lepers'), < MGr. λέπρωσις, leprosy, < Gr. λεπροῦσθαι, become leprous, < λέπρα, leprosy: see lepra, leper[1], leprous.] A name given to several different diseases. Regarding the leprosy of the Jews nothing certain is known. The term was probably applied to various cutaneous diseases, especially those of a chronic or contagious character. The term is now commonly restricted to lepra cutanea, or elephantiasis Græcorum. See lepra.—Black leprosy, a form of lepra exhibiting dark, livid patches.—Dry leprosy. See lepra.

leprous (lep'rus), a. [Also sometimes leperous; < ME. leprous, < OF. leprous, lepros, lepreux = F. lépreux = Sp. Pg. It. leproso, < LL. leprosus, leprous, having leprosy, < L. lepra, leprosy: see lepra, leper[1], 1. The adj. is thus as if < leper[1], 1, + -ous.] 1. Infected with leprosy.

Oure lorde hym comaunded to make a table, in the name of that table at the whiche he was sette in the house of Symond leprouse. Merlin (E. E. T. S.), i. 59.

His hand was leprous as snow. Ex. iv. 6.

2†. Causing leprosy.

In the porches of my ears did pour
The leperous distilment. Shak., Hamlet, i. 5. 64.

3. Covered with white scales. (a) In bot., same as leprose. (b) In entom., covered with large, loose, irregular whitish scales, as the elytra of certain Coleoptera.—Leprous inflammation, inflammation caused by the presence of Bacillus lepræ, and resulting in the formation of leprous tissue.—Leprous tissue, a tissue consisting of round cells, with some fusiform or branched, with scanty fibrillar intercellular substance, and well provided with blood-vessels. It forms nodules up to the size of a walnut, and diffuse masses. It may persist without change, it may ulcerate on violence, or it may atrophy, leaving a scar. It is formed under the influence of Bacillus lepræ, and these bacilli are found in the tissue.

leprousness (lep'rus-nes), n. The state of being leprous.

lepry† (lep'ri), n. [Also leprie, leprey; < ME. lepry, leprie, < OF. leprie, leprosy: see leper[1],] Leprosy.

He made the blynde to se & heled some of lepry.
Joseph of Arimathie (E. E. T. S.), p. 38.

Their breath is contagious, their leprey spreading.
N. Ward, Simple Cobler, p. 18.

lepta, n. Plural of lepton[1].

Leptadenia (lep-ta-dē'ni-ạ), n. [NL. (R. Brown, 1809), < Gr. λεπτός, small, + ἀδήν, a gland.] A genus of plants of the family Asclepiadaceæ and tribe Ceropegieæ, characterized by a double crown and a rotate corolla with filiform lobes. There are about 12 species, shrubs or climbers, with filiform leaves and small flowers, natives of tropical Asia and Africa and Madagascar. Endlicher made this genus the type of a further subdivision, Leptadenieæ.

Leptadenieæ (lep″tad-ē-nī'ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Endlicher, 1836), < Leptadenia + -eæ.] A subdivision of plants, embracing the genera Leptadenia and Orthanthera, included by Bentham and Hooker in the tribe Ceropegieæ.

Leptandra (lep-tan'drạ), n. [NL. (Nuttall, 1818), < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, slender, small, + ἀνήρ (ἀνδρ-), male (in mod. bot. stamen).] 1. A genus of scrophulariaceous plants comprising two species.—2. [l. c.] The rhizome and rootlets of Leptandra Virginica. It is used as a cathartic.

leptandrin (lep-tan'drin), n. [< Leptandra + -in[2].] A bitter glucoside, crystallizing in needles, obtained from Leptandra Virginica, and probably constituting the active principle of the drug leptandra.

Leptidæ[1] (lep'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leptis + -idæ.] A family of dipterous insects, typified by the genus Leptis, founded by Westwood in 1840. They are related to the Tabanidæ or horse-flies, but the simple and not annulate third joint of the antennæ has a styliform bristle. With few exceptions, the species are unable to draw blood. They are about 300 in number, cosmopolitan, of moderate size, and rather sluggish; they sometimes prey on other insects. They are known as snipe-flies.

Leptidæ[2] (lep'ti-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leptus, 1, + -idæ.] An old family of harvest-mites, based mainly or wholly on immature forms.

Leptidea (lep-tid'ē-ạ), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, small.] 1. A genus of butterflies, now called Leucophasia. Billberg, 1820.—2. A genus of cerambycid beetles, having a few species natives of southern Europe and western Asia. Mulsant, 1829.

leptiform (lep'ti-fôrm), a. [< Gr. λεπτός, thin, slender, + L. forma, shape.] Slender in shape; vermiform.

leptinid (lep'ti-nid), n. A beetle of the family Leptinidæ.

Leptinidæ (lep-tin'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leptinus + -idæ.] A family of clavicorn beetles, typified by the genus Leptinus. They have the dorsal segments of the abdomen partly membranous, ventral segments free, tarsi five-jointed (at least one pair of tarsi), mentum transverse with hind angles prolonged, and palpi distant at base.

leptinolite (lep-tin'ō-līt), n. [< Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, small, + suffix -ινος + λίθος, a stone.] A name given by Cordier to a rock produced by the metamorphic action of granite on the adjacent schists, as seen in the French Pyrenees.

Leptinus (lep-tī'nus), n. [NL. (Müller, 1817), < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, small: see lepton[1].] A genus of beetles, formerly of the family Silphidæ, now giving name to the Leptinidæ. These minute beetles live in the trunks of old trees, under fallen leaves, and in decomposing vegetable matter. L. testaceus is common to Europe and North America, though specimens from the latter continent have been described as distinct, under the name L. americanus.

Leptis (lep'tis), n. [NL. (Fabricius, 1805), < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, delicate: see lepton[1].] The typical genus of Leptidæ. The species are of medium size, with short, sparse hair, of a yellowish-red color marked with black or brown. The larvæ live in damp earth and in the burrows of May-beetles. About 30 European and 17 North American species are described.

Leptocardia (lep-tō-kär'di-ạ), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Leptocardii.

leptocardian (lep-tō-kär'di-an), a. and n. [As Leptocardii + -an.] I. a. Pertaining to the Leptocardii, or having their characters.

II. n. A vertebrate of the class Leptocardii; a lancelet, branchiostome, or amphioxus.

Leptocardii (lep-tō-kär'di-ī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, small, + καρδία = E. heart.] The lowest group of true vertebrates; a class or other high division of Vertebrata, to which different values have been assigned by naturalists; the lancelets. In the leptocardians the skeleton is notochordal, acranial, and membranocartilaginous; they have no brain, no jaws, contractile pulsating sinuses instead of a heart, colorless blood, confluent respiratory and abdominal cavities, and many branchial clefts through which water enters to be expelled by an opening in front of the vent. In the older systems the group was considered an order of fishes; by Johannes Müller and others, a subclass of fishes; now, it is generally rated as a separate class of Vertebrata. Other names of the same group, in some of its acceptations, are Cirrostomi, Pharyngobranchii, Acrania, Entomocrania, Cephalochorda, and family Branchiostomidæ or Amphioxidæ. Only about six species are known. Also Leptocardia. See cuts under Branchiostoma and lancelet.

leptocephalic (lep″tō-se-fal'ik or lep-tō-sef'ạ-lik), a. [As leptocephal-y + -ic.] 1. Narrow, as a skull; having a narrow skull; characterized by or exhibiting leptocephaly.—2. In ichth., retaining a long, narrow skull, as certain flatfishes whose skull does not undergo the special modification characteristic of the pleuronectids; leptocephaloid.

Indeed, there seems good reason to believe that many young flat-fish never undergo this change at all, but, swimming about freely in the open sea, assume that peculiarly elongated and strange form known as the leptocephalic.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXIX. 114.

Leptocephalidæ (lep″tō-se-fal'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leptocephalus + -idæ.] 1. A supposed family of fishes of ribbon-like form, with a translucent body, a continuous vertical fin consisting of the united dorsal, caudal, and anal fins, a small head, and lateral branchial apertures. They live in the sea, and are considered to be immature fishes, mostly of the family Congridæ. Leptocephalus morrissi is the larval or immature form of Conger vulgaris. Also Leptocephalini (Bonaparte, 1837).

2. The family otherwise called Congridæ.

leptocephaloid (lep-tō-sef'ạ-loid), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Leptocephalidæ, or having their characters.

II. n. A fish of the Leptocephalus kind, as a larval conger.

Leptocephalus (lep-tō-sef'ạ-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, small, + κεφαλή, head.] 1. A spurious genus of eel-like fishes, having a very thin diaphanous body, formerly regarded as a valid generic type and hence giving name to the Leptocephalidæ, but now generally considered to be the larval form of a conger.—2. [l. c.] The larval or aborted stage of the conger and allied fishes, when the body is much compressed and hyaline and no generative organs are developed.—3. The genus otherwise called Conger.

leptocephaly (lep-tō-sef'ạ-li), n. [< Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, small, + κεφαλή, head.] Narrowness of the skull due to premature synostosis of the sutures between the frontal and sphenoid bones.

Leptoceridæ (lep-tō-ser'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leptocerus + -idæ.] A family of caddis-flies or trichopterous neuropterous insects, typified by the genus Leptocerus, having long slim antennæ, whence the name. It was founded by Stephens in 1836. They have the palpi strongly hairy, ordinarily ascending and with the last joint long and simple, and the wings pubescent and generally narrow. The larval cases are tubular and free, and are found in both standing and running water. These insects are found all over the world; about 50 species are European; some exotic ones are among the largest of their tribe.

Leptocerus (lep-tos′ẹ-rus), n. [NL. (Leach, 1817), < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, delicate, + κέρας, horn.] 1. The typical genus of Leptoceridæ, having the neuration of the fore wings different in the two sexes. The larvæ are slender, and inhabit free tubular cases. There are 16 European species, and the genus is also represented in northern Asia and America.

2. A genus of curculios, now called Naupactus. Schönherr, 1826.

leptodactyl, leptodactyle (lep-tō-dak′til), a. and n. [< NL. leptodactylus, < MGr. λεπτοδάκτυλος, with slender toes (or fingers), < Gr. λεπτός, slender, + δάκτυλος, a finger or toe.] I. a. Having small or slim toes. Also leptodactylous.

II. n. A bird or other animal having slender toes.

leptodactylous (lep-tō-dak′ti-lus), a. [As leptodactyl + -ous.] Same as leptodactyl.

Leptodera (lep-tod′ẹ-rä), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, slender, + δέρος for δέρμα, skin, hide.] A genus of vinegar-eels of the family Anguillulidæ. L. oxyphila is the vinegar-eel formerly called Anguillula aceti. The same or a very similar species found in sour paste is L. glutinis. The form is as simple as possible, being cylindric and tapering, the mouth a slight opening, and the length less than one twelfth of an inch.

Leptodora (lep-tod′ō-rä), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, slender, + δορά, a skin, hide.] The typical genus of Leptodoridæ. L. hyalina is an example. Lilljeborg, 1860.

Leptodoridæ (lep-tō-dor′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leptodora + -idæ.] A family of daphniaceous crustaceans, of the order Cladocera, represented by the genus Leptodora. The form is very peculiar; there are six pairs of ambulatory feet; the abdomen is very long and segmented, and there are no respiratory organs. There is a rudimentary shell in the female only. These water-fleas grow to an inch in length, and occur in fresh water in both America and Europe.

Leptogaster (lep-tō-gas′tėr), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, slender, + γαστήρ, stomach.] 1. A genus of robber-flies or Asilidæ, founded by Meigen in 1804, having the face very narrow and the abdomen long and slender, whence the name. There are about 12 European and nearly 20 North American species.—2. A genus of reduvioid heteropterous insects, containing one Madagascar bug, L. flavipes. Signoret, 1860.—3. A genus of dragon-flies. Hagen, 1861.

Leptoglossa (lep-tō-glos′ä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, slender, + γλῶσσα, the tongue.] 1. A division of Lacertilia, including lizards with slender cleft protrusile tongue: same as Fissilinguia.—2. In Cope's classification, a suborder of lizards.

leptoglossal (lep-tō-glos′al), a. [As Leptoglossa + -al.] Having a slender tongue; specifically, of or pertaining to the Leptoglossa.

leptoglossate (lep-tō-glos′āt), a. and n. [As Leptoglossa + -ate[1].] I. a. Pertaining to the Leptoglossa, or having their characters.

II. n. A lizard of the group Leptoglossa.

Leptoglossus (lep-tō-glos′us), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, slender, + γλῶσσα, the tongue.] 1. An important genus of coreoid bugs, having Leptoglossus phyllopus, twice natural size.

the hind tibiæ usually expanded, erected by Guérin in 1830. The species are subtropical. L. phyllopus is common in the southern United States, where it injures cotton-bolls and oranges.

2. A genus of Australian myzomeline birds. Swainson, 1837. See Acanthorhynchus, 1.

leptogonidium (lep″tō-gō-nid′i-um), n.; pl. leptogonidia (-ä). [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, slender, + NL. gonidium.] Same as gonidimium.

Leptolepidæ (lep-tō-lep′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leptolepis + -idæ.] A family of extinct teleost fishes, typified by the genus Leptolepis, with the vertebræ ossified, the tail homocercal, the scales cycloid, the fins without fulcra, single dorsal fin, and teeth in bands mostly minute. The family flourished in Liassic and Oölitic epochs.

Leptolepis (lep-tol′e-pis), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, small, + λεπίς, a scale: see lepis.] The typical genus of Leptolepidæ, containing extinct clupeiform fishes with small scales, whence the name.

leptology (lep-tol′ō-ji), n. [< Gr. λεπτολογία, minute description, also quibbling, < λεπτός, fine, minute, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] In rhet., minute and detailed description.

leptome (lep′tōm), n. [< Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, slender.] Same as bast[1], 2. Potonié.

Leptomedusæ (lep″tō-mē-dū′sē), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, delicate, + NL. Medusæ.] In Haeckel's classification of hydrozoans, the calyptoblastic hydromedusans, as the campanularian and sertularian polyps, regarded as an order of Medusæ. See Calyptoblastea.

leptomedusan (lep″tō-mē-dū′san), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Leptomedusæ, or having their characters; calyptoblastic, as a hydromedusan.

II. n. One of the Leptomedusæ; a calyptoblastic hydromedusan.

leptomeninges (lep″tō-mē-nin′jēz), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, slender, + μῆνιγξ (μηνιγγ-), a membrane: see meninx.] In anat., the pia mater and arachnoid.

leptomeningitis (lep-tō-men-in-jī′tis), n. [< leptomeninges + -itis. Cf. meningitis.] In pathol., ★inflammation of the pia mater and arachnoid.

Leptomeria (lep-tō-mē′ri-ä), n. [NL. (R. Brown, 1810), so called from the small delicate flowers; < Gr. λεπτός, small, slender, + μέρος, a part.] A genus of dicotyledonous apetalous plants, of the family Santalaceæ and tribe Osyrideæ, with minute hermaphrodite flowers crowded in terminal or lateral racemes or spikes, and small drupes, sometimes with a fleshy exocarp. Fourteen species are known, all natives of Australia, broom-like shrubs with angular or roundish twig-like branches, mostly destitute of leaves except on the young twigs. L. Billardieri is a pretty shrub, six feet high, with white flowers and greenish-red berry-like drupes, the pulp of which is pleasant, acid, and slightly astringent; the drupes are called native currants in New South Wales and Victoria. Remains of plants of this genus occur in considerable abundance in nearly all the deposits of the Tertiary age in Europe.

leptomorphic (lep-tō-môr′fik), a. [< Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, + μορφή, form.] An epithet proposed by Gümbel to designate those mineral constituents of rocks which, although crystalline in structure, are not bounded by their own proper crystalline faces. It is nearly the same in meaning as the "allotriomorphic" of Rosenbusch.

lepton[1] (lep′ton), n.; pl. lepta (-tä). [< Gr. λεπτόν, a small coin, prop. neut. (sc. νόμισμα, coin) of λεπτός, thin, fine, slender, small, lit. peeled, stripped, < λέπειν, peel, strip. Cf. Lepas, lepis.] The smallest coin of modern Greece, equal to a centime. One hundred lepta make a drachma.

Lepton[2] (lep′ton), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτόν, neut. of λεπτός, fine, small, delicate.] The typical genus of Leptonidæ. The shell resembles that of Kellia, is often minutely punctured, and has divergent teeth. There are many species. L. squamosum and L. convexum are British.

Leptonidæ (lep-ton′i-dē), n. pl. [< Lepton[2] + -idæ.] A family of siphonate dimyarian bivalves, typified by the genus Lepton. They have the mantle extensile beyond the shell, and furnished with a row of filaments (one of which is enlarged and prolonged in front); a single short siphon; two branchiæ, complete and separate; foot thick, tapering, and with a byssal groove; and equivalve subequilateral valves, gaping at the end, with an internal ligament and simple pallial impressions. There is one cardinal tooth on each side of the cartilage-pit (sometimes on one side only); of the lateral teeth there are on each side two or only one

f, foot; m, mantle; s, siphon; t, tentacular filament.

leptophloëm (lep-tō-flō′em), n. [< Gr. λεπτός, slender, + E. phloëm.] A rudimentary phloëm: applied by Vaizey to the phloëm of the inner tissue in the seta of some mosses. Compare leptoxylem.

Leptophlœum (lep-tō-flē′um), n. [NL. (Dawson, 1862), < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, delicate, + φλοιός, bark.] A lycopodiaceous fossil plant, allied to Lepidodendron and found in the Devonian of Maine, New Brunswick, and the adjacent region of northeastern America, and also in beds of similar age in Australia. The stem is covered with broad rhombic leaf-bases or -cushions, each with a single small vascular scar a little above its center, and above this a very slight furrow. This is a characteristically Devonian genus.

Leptoplana (lep-top′lā-nä), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, delicate, + πλάνης, a wanderer, < πλάνος, wandering: see planet.] The typical genus of Leptoplanidæ. L. tremellaris is a Mediterranean species.

Leptoplanidæ (lep-tō-plan′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leptoplana + -idæ.] A family of digonoporous dendrocœlous turbellarians, typified by the genus Leptoplana. It contains marine planarians with a flat, broad, and usually very delicate body without distinct cephalic region or tentacles, eyes more or less numerous, mouth usually in advance of the middle of the body, and the genital openings behind the mouth.

leptopod (lep′tō-pod), a. [As Leptopod-a.] Slender-footed, as a member of the Leptopoda.

Leptopoda (lep-top′ō-dä), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, delicate, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] A group of rostriferous gastropods with the foot compressed and adapted for leaping, composed of the families Strombidæ and Phoridæ. J. E. Gray, 1821.

Leptopodia (lep-tō-pō′di-ä), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, slender, + πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] A Long-legged Spider-crab (Leptopodia sagittaria).

genus of spider-crabs, founded by Leach in 1814. They have a small triangular body with a long acute rostrum, and extremely long, slender legs. L. sagittaria, whose body is less than an inch broad, has legs nearly a foot long.

leptopodian (lep-tō-pō′di-an), n. [< Leptopodia + -an.] A crab of the family Leptopodiidæ; a spider-crab or sea-spider.

Leptopodidæ (lep-tō-pod′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leptopoda + -idæ.] In entom., a family of Heteroptera, represented by the genus Leptopus. Also Leptopidæ.

Leptopodiidæ (lep″tō-pō-dī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leptopodia + -idæ.] A family of brachyurous decapod crustaceans, named from the genus Leptopodia; the spider-crabs. ★ leptoprosope (lep-tō-pros′ōp), n. [< Gr. λεπτός, thin, narrow, + πρόσωπον, face: see Prosopis.] Narrowness of the face; the possession of or condition of having a long, narrow face.

leptoprosopic (lep″tō-prō-sop′ik), a. [< leptoprosope + -ic.] Having a long narrow face, as a skull.

> The mid-facial index . . . could be accurately determined in the three Yasinese skulls, in which it is very constant and averages 54.2, making them dolichofacial, or leptoprosopic. Jour. Anthrop. Inst., XVIII. 23.

Leptops (lep′tops), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, narrow, + ὤψ, face, eye.] 1. A genus of fishes, the mud-cats, of the family Siluridæ and subfamily Ictalurinæ, with large flattened head, projecting lower jaw, and peculiar dentition. L. olivaris is a large catfish living on muddy bottoms of streams and lakes in the southern and western parts of the United States. Rafinesque, 1820.

2. In entom., a genus of snout-beetles, of the family Curculionidæ, comprising many Australian species of large or medium size, whitish or brown color, with narrow linear vertical eyes and a distinct scutellum. Schönherr, 1834.

Leptoptila (lep-top′ti-lä), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, delicate, + πτίλον, feather.] A genus of American wood-pigeons, containing about a dozen species, whose outer primaries are incised, attenuate, and bistoury-like at the end; the pin-wing doves. The tarsi are bare; the tail has 12 feathers; the lining of the wings is chestnut; the neck is iridescent; and there are no metallic spots. The genus is also called Engyptila. L. or E. albifrons is found in Texas and Mexico, L. jamaicensis in Jamaica.

Leptoptilus (lep-top′ti-lus), n. [NL., < Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, delicate, + πτίλον, feather.] A genus of storks of Asia and Africa, of the family Ciconiidæ; the adjutants or marabous. Also Leptoptilos. See cut under adjutant-bird.

Leptopus (lep'tō-pus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, delicate, + ποίς = E. foot.] In zoöl., a name of various genera. (a) The typical genus of Leptopidæ or Leptopodidæ, founded by Latreille in 1809, having the prothorax contracted into a neck, the antennæ very slender, and the upper surface of the body often spinous. The species occur in France and Algeria. (b) A genus of dipterous insects of the family Dolichopodidæ. Also called Xanthochlorus. Haliday, 1831. (c) A genus of fishes. Rafinesque, 1815. (e) A genus of crustaceans. Lamarck, 1819. (f) A genus of birds. Fraser, 1844.

leptorrhine, leptorhine (lep'tō-rin), a. [⟨ Gr. λεπτός, thin, small, slender, + ῥίς (ῥιν-), the nose.] 1. Having a small nose or slender snout, as the fossil rhinoceros, Rhinoceros leptorrhinus.—2. Same as leptorrhinian.

leptorrhinian, leptorhinian (lep-tō-rin'i-an), a. [⟨ leptorrhine + -ian.] 1. Having a skull with a nasal index of less than 47 (German anthropologists), of less than 47.9 (Broca).—2. Having a nose the soft parts of which have an index of from 63–69 (Topinard).

leptorrhinic, leptorhinic, a. Leptorrhinian.

Leptoscopidæ (lep-tō-skop'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Leptoscopus + -idæ.] A family of trachinoid fishes represented by the genus Leptoscopus. (a) In a restricted sense it includes only fishes with an elongated antrorsiform body, median lateral line, long continuous dorsal and anal fins, and perfect ventrals with one spinous and five soft rays; (b) in a wider sense it is used for trachinoid fishes of the foregoing form with imperfect as well as with perfect ventral fins, and then divided into two subfamilies, Leptoscopinæ and Dactyloscopinæ.

Leptoscopus (lep-tos'kō-pus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr.

Leptoscopus macropygus.

λεπτός, thin, slender, + σκοπεῖν, view.] The typical genus of Leptoscopidæ. Gill, 1859.

Leptosomatidæ (lep″tō-sō-mat'i-dē), n. pl. [NL.] Same as Leptosomidæ.

Leptosomidæ (lep-tō-som'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Leptosomus + -idæ.] A peculiar Madagascar family of picarian birds represented by the single genus Leptosomus, related to the Coraciidæ or rollers. The feet are zygodactyl to some extent, but the outer toe is not completely reversed. The pterylosis is remarkable for the development of a pair of pygal powder-down patches. The plumage is aftershafted, and the loral plumules form a tuft over each side of the base of the beak. The nostrils are median. The sexes are diverse.

Leptosomus (lep-tō-sō'mus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λεπτός, thin, slender, + σῶμα, body.] 1. The typical genus of Leptosomidæ. L. discolor is the kirumbo. Vieillot, 1816. Also Leptosoma. Bonaparte, 1849. —2. A genus of curculionids, now called Rhadinosomus. Schönherr, 1826.

Kirumbo (Leptosomus discolor).

leptosperm (lep'tō-spėrm), n. A tree of the genus Leptospermum.

Leptospermeæ (lep-tō-spėr'mē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (A. P. de Candolle, 1828), ⟨ Leptospermum + -eæ.] Originally, a suborder, now reduced to a tribe of plants of the family Myrtaceæ, based on the genus Leptospermum, chiefly characterized by the loculicidally dehiscent capsule. It embraces 23 genera, among which are Eucalyptus, Melaleuca, and Metrosideros.

Leptospermum (lep-tō-spėr'mum), n. [NL. (G. Forster, 1776), ⟨ Gr. λεπτός, thin, slender, + σπέρμα, seed.] A genus of plants, the type of the tribe Leptospermeæ of the family Myrtaceæ. It is distinguished by the generally alternate leaves, the stamens not exceeding the corolla, and the numerous ovules. There are about 25 species, shrubs or rarely small trees, with small rigid one- to three-nerved leaves and white flowers, natives of Australia, New Zealand, New Caledonia, and the Indian archipelago. See tea-tree, 2, and sandstay.

leptosporangiate (lep″tō-spō-ran'ji-āt), a. [⟨ Gr. λεπτός, slender, + NL. sporangium + *-ate*1.] In bot., having sporangia formed from a single epidermal cell, as in the true ferns and in the Salviniaceæ and Marsileaceæ. Compare eusporangiate.

Leptostraca (lep-tos'trā-kä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, small, + ὄστρακον, a shell.] An order of Crustacea formed by Claus for the reception of the genus Nebalia and related extinct forms.

Leptothrix (lep'tō-thriks), n. [⟨ Gr. λεπτός, slender, + θρίξ, hair.] 1. A genus of bacteria comprising those having the form of an unbranched non-motile filament, consisting of cylindrical round or ovoid cells joined end to end and inclosed in a sheath. L. buccalis lives on the mucous membrane, and in the fur of the teeth, and may become parasitic on the teeth and cause decay. 2. [l. c.] Any bacterium having this form.

leptoxylem (lep-tō-zī'lem), n. [⟨ Gr. λεπτός, slender, + E. xylem.] In bot., a rudimentary xylem.

Leptura (lep-tū'rä), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λεπτός, thin, slender, + οὐρά, the tail.] A large genus of longicorn beetles of the family Cerambycidæ. Some 75 species occur in North America north of Mexico. L. canadensis, about one half of an inch long, is brownish-black with yellow on the antennæ and red on the elytra.

Lepturеæ (lep-tū'rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1883), ⟨ Lepturus + -eæ.] A subtribe of grasses founded on the genus Lepturus, having one or two stiff empty glumes much longer than the hyaline flowering ones. It embraces four genera besides Lepturus, all natives of the warmer parts of the Old World.

lepturid (lep'tū-rid), n. A member of the Lepturidæ.

Lepturidæ (lep-tū'ri-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Leptura + -idæ.] A family of longicorn insects, typified by the genus Leptura. They have the head narrowed to a neck behind the eyes, which are rounded and do not envelop the base of the antennæ; the front coxæ conical; and the stridulating plate on the mesonotum divided by a smooth portion or by a furrow. These insects occur on flowers. Also written Lepturadæ, Lepturetæ, Lepturida, Lepturites.

Lepturinæ (lep-tū-rī'nē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Leptura + -inæ.] The lepturids rated as a subfamily of Cerambycidæ.

Lepturus (lep-tū'rus), n. [NL. (R. Brown, 1810), ⟨ Gr. λεπτός, slender, + οὐρά, tail (from the slender spikes).] A genus of grasses of the tribe Hordeeæ and type of the subtribe Lepturеæ, characterized by the one- to two-flowered spikelet having one or two rigid outer glumes inclosing the thin pointless flowering glumes. There are about 4 species, natives of southern Europe and northern Africa, temperate Asia, Australia, New Zealand, and the islands of the Pacific. They are generally known as hard-grass, and also as snake's-tail.

Leptus (lep'tus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λεπτός, thin, fine, delicate: see *Lepton*2.] 1. A generic name under which six-legged larval forms of various mites, chiefly of the family Trombidiidæ, but also of Rhyncolophidæ, have been grouped. L. autumnalis, a young rhyncolophid, is the cause of a cutaneous disease in man. L. americanus is a young trombidiid. See harvest-tick. Latreille, 1806. 2. A genus of beetles of the family Cucujidæ: same as Sylvanus. Duftschmidt, 1825.

Lepus (lē'pus), n. [NL., ⟨ L. lepus (lepor-), a hare. Cf. Gr. (Æolic) λεπορίς, (Italic) λεβηρίς, a hare.] 1. The representative and typical genus of Leporidæ. There are about 30 species, of most parts of the world except Australia. South America has but one, the tapeti, L. brasiliensis. India and Africa have several, and North America the largest number. L. timidus is the common hare of Europe. L. cuniculus is the common rabbit, the original of the domestic varieties. The polar hare, white in winter, is L. arcticus or glacialis. Several other species also turn white. L. americanus is the common varying hare of North America. L. campestris is the northern prairie-hare. L. callotis and L. californicus are two large southern hares of the same continent. L. aquaticus is the swamp-hare of the southern United States. L. palustris is the marsh-hare. The common wood-rabbit of the United States is L. sylvaticus. Romerolagus, an aberrant genus, is from Mexico. See cuts under cottontail, hare, and jack-rabbit.

The Constellation Lepus.

2. An ancient southern constellation, situated south of Orion and east of Canis Major. Its brightest star, of 2.7 magnitude, is in a line from the middle star of Orion's belt through the sword of Orion.

Lepyridæ† (lē-pir'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Lepyrus + -idæ.] A family of coleopterous insects, named from the genus Lepyrus. Kirby, 1837.

Lepyrus (lep'i-rus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λεπυρός, in a rind or shell, neut. λεπυρόν, a rind, shell, ⟨ λέπος, a scale, rind: see lepis.] A genus of weevils or Curculionidæ, having the rostrum subangulate and carinate below, and the legs rounded, not sinuate. They are rather large yellowish or grayish beetles, living upon various trees. The species are numerous, and belong to the northern portions of both hemispheres. L. colon is an ashy-gray species, about one third of an inch long, found in Europe and British America, especially upon willows.

leret†. An obsolete form of *lear*1, *leer*1, *leer*3.

Lernæa (lėr-nē'ä), n. [NL., with ref. to the Lernæan hydra, ⟨ L. Lernæa, fem. of Lernæus: see Lernæan.] The typical genus of Lernæidæ, formerly regarded as belonging to the group of nematoid intestinal worms. The male of L. branchialis is 2 or 3 millimeters long, the female twice as large. Also Lernea.

Lernæan, Lernean (lėr-nē'an), a. and n. [⟨ L. Lernæus, ⟨ Gr. Λερναῖος, Lernæan, ⟨ Λέρνα, Λέρνη, > L. Lerna, Lerne, a locality in Argolis.] I. a. 1. Pertaining to the marshy district and the lake and fountain called Lerna, in the region of Argolis in Greece, or to the ancient sacred grove in this district.

> Opened the eye of his conscience to the hundred-headed injustice in the Lernæan Marsh of Modern Society.
> Theodore Parker, Ten Sermons on Religion.

2. [l. c.] Same as lernæoid.—Lernæan hydra, in Gr. myth., a monstrous nine-headed serpent inhabiting the Lernæan marsh, killed by Hercules. See hydra, 1, and Hercules.

II. n. A member of the Lernæidæ or Lernæoidea.

Lernæidæ (lėr-nē'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Lernæa + -idæ.] A family of degraded parasitic crustaceans (fish-lice), of the order Siphonostoma, or giving name to a different order, Lernæoidea. The females of these fish-lice resemble worms rather than crustaceans. The body is unsegmented; there are processes upon the head; the mouth-parts are piercing, with a suctorial tube; and there are four pairs of small swimming-feet. They are found on the eyes, mouth gills, and skin, and sometimes in the flesh of fishes. The small males are parasitic upon the females, and resemble crustaceans more than do the females. There are several genera, as Lernæa, Lernæocera, Lernæonema, Penella, Hæmobaphes, etc. Also Lernæadæ.

lernæiform, lerneiform (lėr-nē'i-fôrm), a. [⟨ NL. Lernæa + L. forma, form.] Having the form or characters of the Lernæoidea; resembling crustaceans of the genus Lernæa.

lernæoid, lerneoid (lėr-nē'oid), a. [⟨ NL. Lernæa + Gr. εἶδος, form.] Pertaining to or having the characters of the Lernæoidea. Also lernæan.

Lernæoidea (lėr-nē-oi'dē-ä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Lernæa + Gr. εἶδος, form.] An order of Epizoa, containing those most degraded parasitic crustaceans whose bodies are worm-like and whose limbs are rudimentary, as in the families Chondracanthidæ, Lernæidæ, and Lernæopodidæ. The limbs, when present, are simple inarticulate processes serving only to fix the parasite on its host. The thorax is inarticulate and the abdomen usually rudimentary. These fish-lice, especially the females, exhibit the extreme of degradation and distortion of form. Also Lernæodea.

Lernæopoda (lėr-nē-op'ō-dä), n. [NL., ⟨ Lernæa + Gr. πούς (ποδ-) = E. foot.] The typical genus of Lernæopodidæ.

lernæopodian (lėr-nē-ō-pō'di-an), n. [⟨ Lernæopoda + -ian.] A fish-louse of the genus Lernæopoda, or some similar species.

Lernæopodidæ (lėr-nē-ō-pod'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Lernæopoda + -idæ.] A family of degraded parasitic crustaceans, of the order Siphonostoma or Lernæoidea. The body consists of head and thorax with rudimentary abdomen, and there are no swimming-feet. The mouth-parts consist of mandibulate and suctorial parts, the maxillipeds attaining some size and serving in the female for attachment. The dwarfed males have clasping-feet, but no swimming-feet. There are several genera of these grotesque fish-lice, as Lernæopoda, Achtheres, Anchorella, Lrachiella, etc.

Lernea, Lernean, etc. See Lernæa, etc.

lerot (lē'rot), n. [⟨ F. lérot, dim. of loir, ⟨ L. glis (glir-), a dormouse: see Glis.] The garden-dormouse, Myoxus or Eliomys nitela, one of the larger dormice of southern Europe, about 6 inches long.

lerp (lėrp), n. [Australian.] A manna secreted by certain flea-lice (Psyllidæ) occurring on the eucalyptus in Australia.

lerruck (ler'uk), n. A dialectal form of laverock, for *lark*1. [Orkney Isles.]

lerry†, n. [Appar. a var. of *lear*1, n.] Learning; lesson. Middleton, Blurt, Master-Constable, iii. 3.

Lerva (lėr′vạ̈), n. [NL. (Hodgson, 1837, as Lerwa; Blyth, 1849, as Lerva), from a native name.] A genus of gallinaceous birds of the family Tetraonidæ; the snow-partridges. L. nivicola, the only species, ranges along the Himalayas into Tibet and China, at an altitude of from 7,000 to 14,000 feet, breeding near the snow-line. The plumage is variegated with chestnut-red, buff, black, and gray; the male is spurred, and weighs about 20 ounces. See snow-partridge. Also called Tetraoperdix.

Himalayan Snow-partridge (Lerva nivicola).

les[1]†, adv. An obsolete form of less.

les[2]†. A Middle English preterit of leese[1].

Lesbia (les′bi-ạ̈), n. [NL., so called with reference to their brilliant metallic color; < L. lesbias or lesbia, a precious stone found in Lesbos: see Lesbian.] 1. A genus of Carabidæ founded by Latreille in 1804. As now restricted, the genus enters the tribe Lesbiini of the subfamily Harpalinæ unisetosæ, and is characterized by having short tibial spurs, distinct antennal scrobes, the first three joints of the antennæ glabrous, and the head constricted behind the eyes. A great many species of rather small size occur in all parts of the globe, but they are especially numerous in the tropical and subtropical parts of the New World. Most of them are either of brilliant metallic color or beautifully variegated with bright contrasting colors. They are usually met with during the daytime on trees and low plants.

2. A genus of humming-birds, or Trochilidæ, with long forked tail, containing such species as L. sylphia or L. gouldi.

Lesbian (les′bi-ạn), a. and n. [< L. Lesbius, < Gr. Λέσβιος, < Λέσβος, > L. Lesbos, Lesbos.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the island of Lesbos in the Ægean sea, which belonged in ancient times, together with the adjoining part of the coast of Asia Minor, to the district called Æolis, and was the home of a famous school of lyric poets, including Alcæus, Sappho, and others. From the reputed character of the inhabitants and the tone of their poetry, Lesbian is often used with the implied sense of 'amatory' or 'erotic.'—Lesbian cyma. See cyma, 1.

II. n. A native or an inhabitant of Lesbos.

lesche (les′kē), n. [< Gr. λέσχη, a place for conversation, a public portico, club-room, etc., also conversation, discussion, < λέγειν, speak: see legend.] In Gr. antiq., a building or covered portico frequented by the people for conversation or the hearing of news. Such edifices were numerous in Greek cities, and their walls were often decorated with historical and patriotic subjects by celebrated painters, as notably at Delphi.

Lescuropteris (les-kū-rop′tẹ-ris), n. [NL., named after Leo Lesquereux, a Swiss-American paleobotanist.] A genus of fossil ferns established by Schimper (1869), which is related to Odontopteris by the mode of attachment of the lateral veins, and to Neuropteris by their direction, but differs from all the forms of the Carboniferous by its peculiar nervation. It occurs in the coal-measures of Ohio and Pennsylvania.

lese[1]†. A Middle English form of lease[1], etc., and leese[1].

lese[2]†, v. t. [ME. lesen, < AS. lȳsan, lēsan, liésan, loose, release, < leás, loose: see loose, -less.] To loose; deliver; release.

lese-majesty (lēz′maj′es-ti), n. [< F. lèse-majesté, < ML. læsa majestas, high treason: L. læsa, fem. of læsus, pp. of lædere, hurt (see lesion); majestas, majesty: see majesty.] In jurisprudence, any crime committed against the sovereign power in a state; treason. The Latin crimen læsæ majestatis denoted a charge brought against a citizen for acts of rebellion, usurpation of office, or general misdemeanors of a political character, which were comprehended under the title of offenses against the majesty of the Roman people. It was lese-majesty to take into a latrine a ring or a piece of money bearing the effigy of Cæsar. Used in Germany as any offense or utterance against the dignity or authority of the reigning power. Also used in a general sense, and often as a reflection on the dignity offended. Also spelled leze-majesty.

lesion (lē′zhon), n. [< F. lésion = Sp. lesión = Pg. lesão = It. lesione, < L. læsio(n-), an injury, < lædere, pp. læsus, hurt. Cf. collide, elide, illide, allision, collision, elision, illision.] 1. A hurting; hurt; wound; injury.—2. In civil law, the loss or injury suffered in a commutative contract by the party who does not receive an equivalent for what he gives. When the inequality amounts to more than one half of the value of what the party gives, it is called in French law lésion d'outre moitié du juste prix, in Spanish law lesion inorme, and, if very much more, lesion inormisima. When the inequality amounts to from one third to one quarter of the value of what the party gives, it is called in French law lésion du tiers au quart.

3. In pathol., any morbid change in the structure of organs. The term is not restricted to visible anatomical changes, but may be applied to such as are revealed solely by a disturbance of function.

When it [peritonitis] arises from a wound, it is probably not the simple injury to the peritoneum that causes the lesion. Quain, Med. Dict., p. 1131.

Focal lesion. See focal.

lesk, lisk (lesk, lisk), n. [< ME. leske, < Dan. lyske = Sw. ljumske = MD. liesche, flank.] The groin or flank. [Prov. Eng.]

The laste was a litylle mane that laide was be-nethe,
His leskes laye alle lene and latheliche to schewe.
Morte Arthure (E. E. T. S.), l. 3280.

Leskea (les′kē-ạ̈), n. [NL. (Johann Hedwig, 1782), named after N. G. Leske (1757–86).] A genus of mosses, the type of the tribe Leskeeæ. It is marked by the narrowly lanceolate teeth of the outer peristome, the narrow and linear segments of the inner, the absence of cilia, and the oblong capsule, which is erect or somewhat arcuate. L. sericea sometimes called golden moss, is very common in England, forming silky yellowish-green patches on ash-trees.

Leskeeæ (les-kē′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (W. P. Schimper, 1860), < Leskea + -eæ.] A tribe of pleurocarpous Bryaceæ or true mosses, embracing Leskea, its type, and a few other genera.

Leskia (les′ki-ạ̈), n. [NL. (Robineau-Desvoidy, 1830), named after N. G. Leske.] 1. A genus of dipterous insects of the family Tachinidæ. They are rather large bristly flies of dark-yellowish or -greenish color, chiefly of Europe and Asia. The larvæ are internal parasites of other insects. L. aurea of Europe infests the larvæ of moths of the genus Sesia, and L. sericaria of Japan affects the silkworm of commerce with the disease known as uji. The latter species has been placed in a genus Ujimyia. See uji.

2. A genus of spatangoid sea-urchins having the mouth closed by triangular converging plates, as in L. mirabilis. J. E. Gray, 1851. Also called Palæostoma.

Leskiidæ (les-kī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leskia + -idæ.] A family of spatangoid sea-urchins named from the genus Leskia. Also Leskiadæ.

Leskiinæ (les-ki-ī′nē), n. pl. [NL., < Leskia + -inæ.] A subfamily of irregular sea-urchins, of the family Spatangidæ.

Lesleya (les′le-yạ̈), n. [NL., named after J. P. Lesley.] A genus of fossil ferns established by Lesquereux (1879). It is related to Neuropteris by some of its characters, and to Megalopteris and Tæniopteris by others. It differs from the fronds commonly known as Glossopteris in that its venation is dichotomous and not reticulate. Eight species have been described, two from the Carboniferous of America.

Leslie's cube. See cube.

Lespedeza (les-pẹ̈-dē′zạ̈), n. [NL. (A. Michaux, 1803), named after D. Lespedez, the Spanish governor of Florida in the time of Michaux.] A genus of leguminous plants of the tribe Hedysareæ, distinguished by the generally one-seeded and one-jointed pod and the pinnately trifoliate leaves without stipules. See hoopkoop-plant, and Japan clover (under Japan).

less[1] (les), a. compar. [< ME. lesse, lasse, < AS. læssa (= OFries. lessa), less, smaller, for læsra*, compar. (with superl. læsast, læsest, lǣst, > E. least[1], q. v.), from a positive prob. appearing in a deriv. form in Goth. lasiws, weak (see lass[2], lazy), but associated in meaning with the unrelated lytel, little, small: see little. Cf. less[1], adv. Hence lest[1], unless, less[2].] 1. Not so much or so large; of smaller quantity, amount, bulk, or capacity; inferior in dimensions, extent, or duration: as, less honor or reward; less profit or possessions; less time; less distance; less scope or range; the reward is less than he deserves; a man of less courage or ability; an article of less weight or value.

It is like a grain of mustard-seed, which . . . is less than all the seeds that be in the earth. Mark iv. 31.

Thou . . . wouldst . . . teach me how
To name the bigger light, and how the less,
That burn by day and night.
Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 335.

More glory will be won,
Or less be lost. Milton, P. L., iv. 854.

The sea having lost to the north, and also to the west, on the side of the antient causeway to the island, is the reason why the eastern port [of Pharos] at present is the less. Pococke, Description of the East, I. 3.

Even so late as less than half a century ago this region was still . . . most attractive. O. W. Holmes, Emerson, i.

2. Not so great, considerable, or important; of smaller scope or consequence; lower in the scale: as, St. James the Less; his honors are less than his deserts.

But he that is lesse in the kyngdom of heavenes is more than he. Wyclif, Mat. xi. 11.

Whan thise [tidings] were told to lasse & to more.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 4768.

Look for no less [punishment] than death.
Shak., W. T., iii. 2. 92.

What power shall stand in that frightful time when rebellion hath become a less evil than endurance?
Macaulay, Conversation between Cowley and Milton.

Great tracts of wilderness,
Wherein the beast was ever more and more,
But man was less and less, till Arthur came.
Tennyson, Coming of Arthur.

=Syn. Smaller, Less, Fewer. Smaller is rather more exact than less, but is used freely of persons and of things both concrete and abstract: as, a smaller man, soul, size. Less is not used of persons: as, less trouble, happiness, size, degree; less of an evil. With reference to size and number, the proper words are smaller and fewer. "This apple is less than that," "There were less people there than I expected," are inelegant and erroneous, although similar expressions are often used both in speech and in writing. While the latter, however, is inexcusable, the former may be used sparingly without offense in certain collocations, especially in poetry. The allusion to the mustard-seed in Mark iv. 31 appears to be the only example in the Bible of the use of less in the sense of 'smaller in size.' In Shakspere's plays the word occurs more than two hundred times, and in Milton's poems more than a hundred; in the former it is used only four or five times and in the latter three times in the sense of 'smaller in size,' and never in that of 'fewer.'

The razor's edge invisible,
Cutting a smaller hair than may be seen.

Of harmes two the lesse is for to cheese.
Chaucer, Troilus, ii. 470.

If we are mark'd to die, we are enow
To do our country loss; and if to live,
The fewer men the greater share of honour.
Shak., Hen. V., iv. 3. 22.

less[1] (les), adv. compar. [< ME. lesse, les, las, < AS. læs (= OS. les), compar. adv., associated with læssa, adj.: see less[1], a.] In a smaller or lower degree; to an inferior extent, amount, etc.; in a decreased or abated way or manner: as, less prudent; less carefully executed; to exaggerate less; to think less of a person.

Sche changyd hyr colour lesse and more.
The Horn of King Arthur (Child's Ballads, I. 24).

His guide now led the way into another valley, where he would be less exposed to danger.
Irving, Granada, p. 95.

My life I value less
Than yonder fool his gaudy dress.
Whittier, Mogg Megone, i.

less[1]† (les), v. [< ME. lessen, lessen, < lesse, less: see less, a. Cf. lessen.] I. trans. To make less; lessen.

If we thus do . . . we shal . . . with this cumfort finde our hartes lighted, and therby the griefe of our tribulation lessed.
Sir T. More, Cumfort against Tribulation (1573), fol. 53.

II. intrans. To become less; lessen.

The day is gon, the moneth passid,
Hire love encreseth and his lasseth.
Gower. (Halliwell.)

Lessen gan his hope and ek his myght.
Chaucer, Troilus, v. 1488.

less[2]† (les), conj. [An aphetic form of unless.] Unless. B. Jonson.

And the mute Silence hist along,
'Less Philomel will deign a song.
Milton, Il Penseroso, l. 56.

-less. [< ME. -les, -leas, < AS. -leás = OS. -lōs = OFries. -las = D. -los = MLG. LG. -los = OHG. MHG. -lōs, G. -los = Icel. -lauss = Dan. Sw. -lös = Goth. -laus, a suffix meaning 'free from, without,' orig. an independent word, AS. leás, etc., free, loose, governing the genitive, as in dreáma leás, without joys, but becoming a mere suffix, as in endeleás, without end, endless, scamleás, without shame, shameless. See lease[4], loose, a.] A common English suffix forming, from nouns, adjectives meaning 'without' (lacking, wanting, void of, destitute of) the thing or quality denoted by the noun: as, childless, without a child; fatherless, without a father; endless, without end; hopeless, without hope; leafless, without leaves; shameless, without shame; so motherless, penniless, faithless, godless, graceless, lawless, witless, remediless, tasteless, etc. It is applicable to any noun of which absence or destitution may be asserted. It is opposed to -ful, and is usually equivalent to the negative un-[1] prefixed to an adjective in -ful, -y[1], -ing[2], or -ed[2], as unhopeful, unwitty, unending, unmatched, etc., equivalent to hopeless, witless, endless, matchless, etc. It is in some cases attached to a verb, or to a word rare as a noun while common as a verb, as in ceaseless, doless, fadeless, relentless, repentless, shunless, etc.

lessee (le-sē′), n. [< OF. lessé, pp. of lesser, let, lease, F. laisser, let, leave: see lease[2], v.] The person to whom a lease is granted; a tenant taking an estate by lease.

E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 340.

lesseeship (le-sē′ship), n. [< lessee + -ship.] The condition or state of being a lessee.

lesselt, n. Same as lefesel. Bailey.

lessen (les′n), v. [< less[1] + -en[1]. Cf. less[1], v.]
I. intrans. 1. To become less; contract in bulk, quantity, number, or amount; decrease; diminish; shrink.

Naught was 'twixt the sea and him at last,
Except a lessening belt of yellow sand.
William Morris, Earthly Paradise, II. 178.

2. To come to appear less from increase of distance.

In mounting up in antiquity, like hawks, they did not only lessen, but fly out of sight, even beyond the ken and cognizance of any record. Fuller, Worthies, xvi.

A rustling as of wings in flight,
An upward gleam of lessening white,
So passed the vision, sound and sight.
Whittier, The Watchers.

II. trans. 1. To make less; diminish; reduce in number, size, degree, or quality.

Wickedness is by being acknowledged lessened, and doth grow by being hid.
Quoted in Hooker's Eccles. Polity, vi. 4.

Well, we shall then know more; and Buckingham Shall lessen this big look. Shak., Hen. VIII., i. 1. 119.

2. To degrade; reduce in dignity; depreciate; disparage.

The making of new Lords lessens all the rest.
Selden, Table-Talk, p. 69.

St. Paul chose to magnify his office when ill men conspired to lessen it. Bp. Atterbury.

3. To cause to appear less from increase of distance; specifically, in falconry, to soar above or beyond.

Our two sorrows
Work, like two eager hawks, who shall get highest;
How shall I lessen thine? for mine, I fear,
Is easier known than cur'd.
Beau. and Fl., King and No King, iv. 1.

lessening (les′ning), n. [Verbal n. of lessen, v.] 1. The act or process of making or becoming less. Specifically—2. In falconry, a soaring flight.

A flight of madness, like a falcon's lessening, makes them the more gaz'd at. Collier, Eng. Stage, p. 73.

lesser (les′ėr), a. [< less[1] + -er[3]. This is the compar. less[1], with the reg. compar. -er[3] superfluously annexed.] Less; smaller; minor.

God made . . . the lesser light to rule the night.
Gen. i. 16.

This is some monster of the isle with four legs. . . . I'll pull thee by the lesser legs. Shak., Tempest, ii. 2. 108.

[Lesser is not so common as less, but it is almost always used after the definite article, and in antithesis to greater, as well as in certain specific uses, as in lesser Armenia.] —Lesser appoggiatura, in music, the short appoggiatura.—Lesser barbiton. Same as kit[5].—Lesser Dionysia, Eleusinia, excommunication, George, etc. See the nouns.—Lesser line, the lesser of two lines whose squares are incommensurable, and the sum of whose squares is rational, while the rectangle is medial.—Lesser litany. See litany.—Lesser sixth, third, etc., in music, a minor sixth, third, etc.

lessert (les′ėr), adv. [< lesser, a.] 1. In a smaller degree; less.

Some say he's mad; others that lesser hate him
Do call it valiant fury. Shak., Macbeth, v. 2. 13.

2. To less purpose.

I was an ear-witness
When this young man spoke lesser than he acted,
And had the soldier's voice to help him out.
Beau. and Fl., Laws of Candy, ii. 1.

lesses (les′ez), n. pl. [< ME. lesses, < OF. (F.) laissées, dung, lit. leavings, < laissé, pp. of laisser, leave: see lease[2], v. t.] In hunting, the ordure or excrement of the boar, wolf, or bear.

And ȝif men speke and aske hym of the fumes, he shal clepe fumes of an hert croteynge, of a bukke and of the roo-bukke, of the wilde boor, and of blake beestys, and of wolfes, he shal clepe it lesses. MS. Bodl., 546. (Halliwell.) lessness (les′nes), n. The quality or condition of being less; diminution; abatement; inferiority; insignificance; meanness. [Rare.]

In the original it hath no such relation to lessness or greatness of person.
Sir T. Wyatt, To the King, Feb. 3, 1540.

lesson (les′n), n. [< ME. lessoun, lessun, lescun, < OF. leçon, F. leçon = Sp. lección = Pg. lecção = It. lezione, < L. lectio(n-), a reading, < legere, pp. lectus, read: see legend. Cf. lection, a doublet of lesson.] 1. A reading; a part of a book or writing read (originally aloud) at one time for information or instruction.

Of the worthi wedding was bi-fore graunted
Bi-twene the meyde Meliors & the prince of Grece;
Now listenes, lef lordes, this lessoun thus i ginne.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 1929.

Specifically—2. A portion of Scripture or other sacred writing appointed to be read during divine service. Lessons were used in the very early days of the Christian Church, being taken at first from the Old Testament, but to these were soon added selections from the New Testament, and later from the homilies of the fathers and from the Acts of Martyrs and Saints. In the Anglican Church the first lesson at morning or evening prayer is taken from the Old Testament (with inclusion of the books called the Apocrypha), and the second lesson from the New Testament. Those of the Roman Catholic Church include also lessons from the Acts of Martyrs and Saints, read on their memorial days. Also called lection.

3. Something to be learned at one time; a task assigned for study and recitation; a division of a text-book, or a particular portion of knowledge of any kind, constituting a single exercise for a pupil.

When baith bent doun ower a braid page,
Wi' ae buik on our knee,
Thy lips were on thy lesson, but
My lesson was in thee.
Motherwell, Jeanie Morrison.

One lesson from one book we learn'd.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, lxxix.

4. Instruction conveyed to a pupil at a set time: as, to give lessons in drawing or music.

"Tom, you needn't go; I'm sure you wont be called up at first lesson." Tom felt that he would risk being floored at every lesson for the rest of his natural school-life, sooner than go; so sat down.
T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Rugby, ii. 6.

5. Something learned, or that may be learned; a special piece of knowledge gained or imparted; an inculcation serving for guidance or for warning.

letter-founding (let'ėr-foun″ding), n. Same as type-founding.

letter-foundry (let'ėr-foun″dri), n. Same as ★type-foundry.

letter-head (let'ėr-hed), n. 1. A printed form of address or advertisement at the head of a sheet of letter-paper. Also called letter-heading.—2. A sheet of letter-paper so headed.

He drew up a note upon the "tavern" letter-head.
Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 649.

letter-heading (let'ėr-hed″ing), n. Same as ★letter-head, 1.

lettering (let'ėr-ing), n. [Verbal n. of letter[3], v.] 1. The act of stamping or marking with letters.—2. The letters impressed or marked upon anything; any inscription, as on a sign-board, coin, or tombstone.

lettering-box (let'ėr-ing-boks), n. A small case in which are kept the types used by bookbinders for lettering books.

lettering-tool (let'ėr-ing-tōl), n. In bookbinding, a small box of brass mounted on a handle of wood, in which types are fastened by means of a side-screw, used by the finisher in the lettering of books.

letterize (let'ėr-īz), v. i.; pret. and pp. letterized, ppr. letterizing. [< letter[3] + -ize.] To write letters or epistles. Lamb. [Rare.]

letterleaf (let'ėr-lēf), n. An orchid of the genus Grammatophyllum: so named from its figured leaves. Also called letter-plant.

letterless (let'ėr-les), a. [< letter[3] + -less.] Unlettered; illiterate; not learned.

A meer daring letterless commander can, in a rational way, promise himself no more success in his enterprise than a mastif can in his contest with a lion.
Waterhouse, Apology (1653), p. 125.

There was an illiterate generation, and a letterless race to be educated. The Century, XXVIII. 157.

letter-lichen (let'ėr-lī″ken), n. A lichen of the genus Opegrapha. The apothecium assumes irregularly stellate or radiate forms, suggesting written characters. Also called scripture-wort.

letterling (let'ėr-ling), n. [< letter[3] + -ling[1].] A little letter. Imp. Dict.

letter-lock (let'ėr-lok), n. A form of permutation-lock, in which the combinations are indicated by particular arrangements of pieces marked with letters.

letternt (let'ėrn), n. See lectern.

letter-name (let'ėr-nām), n. In musical notation, the alphabetic name or symbol of tones, of keys of the keyboard, of degrees of the staff, or of notes placed upon such degrees and representing such tones or keys. See keyboard, notation, staff. Also letter.

letter-office (let'ėr-of″is), n. A place for the deposit and distribution of letters; a post-office.

letteront, n. An obsolete form of lectern.

letter-ornament (let'ėr-ôr″na-ment), n. A decoration made up of the forms of letters. In some letter-ornaments the letters are complete and legible, and usually, though not necessarily, forming words, as is common in Russian art and in modern art of the Levant, as on metal-work. In others the letters are modified or wholly changed for decorative effect, or parts only of the letters are given, as sometimes in Byzantine art and in European imitations of it, and also in early northern decoration, Anglo-Saxon, etc.

letter-paper (let'ėr-pā″pėr), n. Paper for writing letters on; specifically, paper of an intermediate size between note-paper and foolscap, usually quarto, as distinguished from the octavo form of note-paper.

letter-perfect (let'ėr-pėr″fekt), a. Perfect to the letter in committing anything to memory; having a part or a speech thoroughly memorized: used especially of actors.

letter-plant (let'ėr-plant), n. Same as letter-leaf.

letterpress (let'ėr-pres), n. and a. [< letter[3], type, + press[1], print.] I. n. Letters or words impressed on paper or other material from printing-types; printed text: so called when subordinate to or in contrast with illustrations.

The letterpress with which the illustration is accompanied is no less interesting than the plate, and furnishes much valuable information. N. and Q., 7th ser., II. 360.

II. a. Consisting of, relating to, or employed in printing from types: as, letterpress printing.

letter-press (let'ėr-pres), n. [< letter[3], a writing, + press[1], printing-machine.] A press for copying letters by transfer; a copying-press.

letter-punch (let'ėr-punch), n. A steel punch on the end of which a letter is engraved. Such punches are used for making matrices for printing-type, as well as for making an impression on metal, etc., when applied against the surface and struck with a hammer.

letter-rack (let'ėr-rak), n. 1. A tray divided into small compartments in which large types of wood are ranged.—2. A rack or small frame, usually ornamented, in which letters, arranged as answered and unanswered or otherwise, are kept.

letter-scale (let'ėr-skāl), n. Same as letter-balance.

letter-stamp (let'ėr-stamp), n. A stamp used in a post-office for canceling postage-stamps, or for stamping on letters or packages various notices or remarks, such as the place of mailing, instructions for the carrier, etc.

letteruret, lettruret, n. [ME., < OF. letterure, lettrure, letreüre, < L. litteratura, literatura, learning, letters, literature: see literature.] 1. Learning; letters; literature.

Al conne he letterure or conne he noon,
As in effect he shal fynde it al oon.
Chaucer, Prol. to Canon's Yeoman's Tale, l. 293.

2. Writing; scripture.

"Lo!" seith holy letterrure, "whiche lordes beth this shrewes!" Piers Plowman (B), x. 27.

letter-winged (let'ėr-wingd), a. Having the wings marked as if with letters: specifically said of a kite, Elanus scriptus. P. L. Sclater.

letter-wood (let'ėr-wůd), n. The heart-wood of the South American tree Piratinera Guianensis. It is extremely hard, of a beautiful brown color with black spots, which have been compared to hieroglyphics; hence the name, which is also applied to the tree. Being rare and costly, the wood is used for veneering only. Also called leopard-wood and snake-wood.

letter-writer (let'ėr-rī″tėr), n. 1. One who writes letters; specifically, one whose profession it is to write letters for others.

The same desire impels thousands of people to write letters to the newspapers; but these letter-writers are not usually journalists. Athenæum, Jan. 14, 1888, p. 43.

2. A book containing rules and examples for the use of persons unskilled in the writing of letters.

Lettic (let'ik), a. and n. [< Lett + -ic.] I. a. Of or pertaining to the Letts or their congeners; related to the Letts: as, the Lettic language; the Samoghitians are a Lettic people. Lettic race is a general term for the Letts, Lithuanians, and Borussians or Old Prussians.

II. n. Same as Lettish.

lettice[1]†, n. An obsolete spelling of lettuce.

lettice[2]†, n. An obsolete form of lattice.

lettice[3]† (let'is), n. [Early mod. E. also lettyce; < OF. letice, letisse, laitice, an animal of a very white color, supposed to be an ermine, also a white fur, < F. lait, < L. lac (lact-), milk: see lettuce.] A kind of fur, white or very light-colored, in use as late as the middle of the sixteenth century.

You shall charge your selues with many [furs], . . . as good marterns, miniuers, otherwise called Lettis.
Hakluyt's Voyages, I. 298.

lettice-cap[1]†, n. [Perhaps < lettice[1] + cap[1], in allusion to lettice-cap[2].] A soporific in which lettuce is supposed to have been a leading ingredient.

Bring in the lettice-cap. You must be shaved, sir;
And then how suddenly we'll make you sleep!
Fletcher, Monsieur Thomas, iii. 1.

lettice-cap[2]†, n. [< lettice[2] (?) = lattice (see quot. from Nares), or lettice[3], + cap[1].] A kind of cap.

A lettice-cap it wears and beard not short.
Shippe of Safegarde (1569).

A lettice-cap was originally a lattice-cap—that is, a net cap which resembles lattice work. Nares.

Lettish (let'ish), a. and n. [< Lett + -ish[1].] I. a. Of or pertaining to the division of the Lettic or Lithuanian race distinctively called Letts: as, the Lettish language; Lettish customs.

II. n. The language spoken by the Letts, a branch of the Indo-European family, closely related to Slavonian or Slavic. Also Lettic.

lettre-de-cachet (let'r-dė-ka-shā′), n. [F.: lettre, letter; de, of; cachet, seal: see letter[3], de[2], cachet.] See cachet.

lettrure†, n. See letterure.

Lettsomia (let-sō'mi-ą), n. [NL. (W. Roxburgh, 1814), named after J. C. Lettsom, an English naturalist.] An untenable name for Moorcroftia, a genus of plants of the family Convolvulaceæ, the fruit of which is a soft, several-seeded berry. There are 13 species, found in southern Asia and the Malay archipelago, twining or climbing vines with alternate leaves and dense corymbose cymes in the axils. Some of the species are used medicinally.

lettsomite (let'sǫm-īt), n. [After W. G. Lettsom, an English mineralogist.] A basic sulphate of copper, of a bright-blue color: same as cyanotrichite.

lettuce (let'is), n. [Early mod. E. also lettice; < ME. letuce, < OF. laituce, letuce*, usually laitue, letue, F. laitue (> D. latuw) = Sp. lechuga = It. lattuga = AS. lactuce = OHG. lattuh, lattouch, latoch, latohha, MHG. lateche, latech, lattech, G. lattich = Sw. Dan. laktuk, < L. lactuca, lettuce, so called from its milky juice, < lac (lact-), milk: see lactate.] 1. A garden-herb, Lactuca sativa, a hardy annual, extensively cultivated for use as a salad. It is believed by some to be derived from L. scariola or L. virosa. There are many varieties of the garden-plant, which may be grouped as cabbage-lettuces, low forms with depressed cabbage-like heads, and Cos lettuces, erect-growing varieties having the head long and tapering downward.

The bason then being brought up to the bishop, he often dipped a large lettice into it, and several times sprinkled all the people. Pococke, Description of the East, II. i. 18.

These are creeping Lettuces of a very milky Juice, like their Name. N. Bailey, tr. of Colloquies of Erasmus, I. 302.

Letuce of lac derivyed is perchaunce;
ffor mylk it hath or yeveth abundaunce.
Palladius, Husbondrie (E. E. T. S.), p. 51.

2. Any plant of the genus Lactuca; also, a plant having some resemblance to Lactuca.—Blue lettuce, a plant of the genus Mulgedium, with blue flowers. [U. S.]—Cabbage-lettuce, Cos lettuce. See def. 1.—Drumhead lettuce, a variety of cabbage-lettuce.—False lettuce. Same as blue lettuce.—Frog's lettuce, a species of pondweed, Potamogeton densus. [Prov. Eng.]—Garden-lettuce. See def. 1.—Indian lettuce, the American columbo, Frasera Carolinensis; also, the false wintergreen, Pyrola rotundifolia.—Lamb's lettuce, corn-salad. See Valerianella.—Loafed lettuce†. See loaf[1].—Prickly lettuce, Lactuca scariola.—Sea-lettuce, the seaweed Ulva Lactuca. Also called lettuce-laver. [Eng.]—Wall-lettuce, Lactuca muralis. [Eng.]—Water-lettuce, Pistia Stratiotes of the tropics.—White lettuce, Nabalus albus or kindred species. Also called lion's-foot, rattlesnake-root, etc.—Wild lettuce. (a) In England, Lactuca scariola. (b) In America, Lactuca Canadensis. Also called trumpetweed and trumpet-milkweed. (c) Sometimes the same as blue lettuce.

lettuce-bird (let'is-bėrd), n. The thistle-bird or common American goldfinch, Chrysomitris tristis. [Local, U. S.]

lettuce-opium (let'is-ō″pi-um), n. Lactucarium.

lettuce-saxifrage (let'is-sak″si-frāj), n. A plant of the Alleghany mountains, Saxifraga micranthidifolia, the leaves of which have sharply erose teeth.

letuaryt, n. See electuary.

let-up (let'up), n. [< let up, verb. phrase under let[1], v.] A cessation of restraint or obstruction; release; relaxation; intermission, as of labor. [Colloq., U. S.]

Our little let-up Wednesday afternoons . . . is sure to come, while the let-ups we get other days, . . . you can't be sure whether you're going to get them or not.
The Century, XXVIII. 588.

leu (lā), n.; pl. lei (lē). [Rumanian.] The unit of the monetary system of Rumania, equivalent to the French franc, or 19.3 United States cents.

Leucadendron (lū-ka-den'drǫn), n. [NL. (Linnæus, 1753), irreg. < Gr. λευκός, white, + δένδρον, a tree.] A genus of plants of the family Proteaceæ and tribe Proteeæ. There are about 60 species, natives of southern and tropical Africa, a few extending into Abyssinia. They bear alternate or scattered rigid entire leaves, of many shapes in the different species, and flowers in large dense round or cone-like heads, with numerous overlapping scales between, which are sometimes conspicuous and colored. L. Cinaroides is known as the Cape artichoke-flower, and L. melliferum (Protea mellifera of Thunberg) as the Cape honeysuckle.

leucæmia, leucæmic. See leucemia, leucemic.

Leucania (lū-kā'ni-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. λευκός, white: see leucous.] A genus of noctuid moths founded by Hübner in 1816. It is characterized by full hairy eyes, smooth front, well-developed palpi, strong tongue, simple antennæ, hairy unarmed legs, rounded collar, quadrate slightly tufted thorax, and untufted abdomen. L. unipuncta is the adult of the well-known army-worm (which see). L. albilinea is the adult of the wheat-head army-worm, an insect which occasionally appears in great numbers and feeds upon heads of wheat and rye. Leucania is undoubtedly a synonym of Heliophila Huebn.

Leucaniidæ (lū-kā-nī'i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leucania + -idæ.] A group of noctuid moths, represented by the genus Leucania, and regarded as a family. There are about 20 genera, widely distributed. Also called Leucanidæ.

leucaniline (lū-kan'i-lin), n. [< Gr. λευκός, white, + E. aniline.] A white crystalline substance ($C_{20}H_{21}N_3$) forming colora, a, larvæ on a wheat-head; b, eggs (natural size); c, d, egg (top and side views, magnified); lower figure, male moth.

Wheat-head Army-worm (Leucania albilinea).

less salts, prepared by treating fuchsine salts with zinc-dust and hydrochloric acid. It yields rosaniline by oxidation.

Leucanthemum (lū-kan′thē-mum), n. [L., also leucanthemis, ⟨ Gr. λευκάνθεμον, the camomile, ⟨ λευκός, white, + ἄνθεμον, flower.] A section of the genus Chrysanthemum, embracing the species C. Leucanthemum (Leucanthemum vulgare), the oxeye daisy or whiteweed. It was retained as a genus by A. P. de Candolle (1837), with 20 species.

leucanthous (lū-kan′thus), a. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + ἄνθος, flower.] In bot., having white flowers.

Leucaster (lū-kas′tėr), n. [NL. (J. D. Choisy, 1849), ⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + ἀστήρ, a star.] A genus of plants belonging to the family Nyctaginaceæ and type of the tribe Leucastereæ, distinguished by having but two stamens. The only species, L. caniflorus, is a native of Brazil, and is a half-twining shrub with entire alternate leaves, and white flowers in axillary cymes.

Leucastereæ (lū-kas-tē′rē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1880), ⟨ Leucaster + -eæ.] A tribe of plants of the family Nyctaginaceæ, distinguished by a subglobose achenium, which is free and inclosed by the base of the perianth, and a short curved or annular embryo. It includes the genera Leucaster (type of the tribe), Andradea, Ramisia, and Reichenbachia, tropical American trees or shrubs with alternate leaves.

leucaugite (lū-kâ′jīt), n. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, bright, light, white, + αὐγίτης*: see augite.] An aluminous variety of pyroxene, allied to augite, but containing very little iron, and hence of a white or grayish color.

leucemia, leucæmia (lū-sē′mi-ą), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + αἷμα, blood.] A disease characterized by a large excess of the white corpuscles of the blood, with hypertrophy of the spleen or the lymphatic glands, or changes in the bone-marrow. It is usually fatal. Also called leucocythemia.

leucemic, leucæmic (lū-sē′mik), a. [⟨ leucemia + -ic.] Pertaining to or affected with leucemia.

> With one exception, that of leucæmic blood (Scherer), no glutin has as yet been found in the fluids of the body. Frey, Histol. and Histochem. (trans.), p. 22.

leuch (lyöċh). A Scotch preterit of laugh.

leuchtenbergite (loiċh′ten-bėrg-īt), n. [Named after the duke Maximilian von Leuchtenberg.] A kind of chlorite of a white or greenish-white color, occurring in hexagonal plates or crystals.

leucin (lū′sin), n. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + *-in*2.] A white pulverulent substance, amino-caproic acid ($C_6H_{11}O_2NH_2$), obtained by treating muscular fiber with sulphuric acid, and afterward with alcohol. It crystallizes in shining scales. It is one of the principal products of the decomposition of nitrogenous matter, and occurs normally in various tissues and fluids of the body, being also a product of the pancreatic digestion of the proteids. Also called aposepidin.

leucisciform (lū-sis′i-fôrm), a. [⟨ NL. Leuciscus + L. forma, form.] Having the form of a fish of the genus Leuciscus; resembling a dace.

Leuciscina (lū-si-sī′nä), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Leuciscus + *-ina*2.] In Günther's ichthyological system, the eighth group of Cyprinidæ. They have the air-bladder divided into anterior and posterior portions; pharyngeal teeth developed in single or double series; the anal fin short or of moderate length (not extending forward to below the dorsal), with from 8 to 11 branched rays; the lateral line when complete running in or nearly in the middle of the tail; and the dorsal fin short, without osseous ray. The species are very numerous, and include the majority of the most familiar European and North American cyprinoid fishes, as the dace and roach.

Leuciscinæ (lū-si-sī′nē), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Leuciscus + -inæ.] In Jordan's ichthyological system, a subfamily of Cyprinidæ, with the air-bladder next to the roof of the abdominal cavity, the dorsal fin short, median, and spineless, and the lower jaw normal. It embraces partly or wholly the Leuciscina and Abramidina of Günther; and by far the greater portion of the American as well as Eurasiatic cyprinoids belong to it.

leuciscine (lū′si-sin), a. and n. I. a. Pertaining to the Leuciscinæ, or having their characters; leuciscoform.

II. n. One of the Leuciscina or Leuciscinæ.

Leuciscus (lū-sis′kus), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λευκίσκος, the white mullet, ⟨ λευκός, white: see leucous.] A genus of cyprinoid fishes to which various limits have been assigned, typical of the subfamily Leuciscinæ. Leuciscus leuciscus is the English dace. See cut under dace.

leucism (lū′sizm), n. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white: see leucous and -ism.] In zoöl., whiteness resulting from lack or loss of coloring; albinism, partial or complete: a technical term, correlated with melanism and erythrism. See albinism.

leucite (lū′sīt), n. [So called from its whiteness; ⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + *-ite*2.] A mineral originally found in the recent volcanic rocks of southern Italy, especially at Vesuvius, disseminated through the lavas in crystals, usually trapezohedrons, or in irregular masses. It has also been observed similarly associated in some other regions, as the Eifel in Rhenish Prussia, the Leucite Hills of Wyoming, etc.; but it is in general of very limited occurrence. It is a silicate of aluminium and potassium, and has a white or grayish color. It was very early called white garnet, from its similarity to garnet in crystalline form; and it is also called amphigene. Leucite has excited much interest because of the phenomenon of double refraction which its crystals exhibit, this being at variance with the usually accepted isometric form. On account of these "optical anomalies," and because also of certain variations in external form, it has been referred to the tetragonal (or orthorhombic) system. Recent investigations have shown, however, that at a temperature of 500° C. it becomes isotropic, and hence it is inferred that when formed it was normally isometric, and that the observed variations in form and optical character have resulted from subsequent molecular changes.—Leucite rocks, igneous rocks, varying greatly in composition, containing leucite in the place of feldspar. These rocks are for the most part, so far as known, of very modern origin. They are particularly well developed in southern Italy and the Eifel. See leucitophyre, phonolite, and tephrite.

leucite-basalt (lū′sīt-bą-sâlt″), n. An igneous rock of basaltic habit containing leucite in place of feldspar. Rosenbusch divides the leucite rocks into leucite-basalts and leucitites.

leucitic (lū-sit′ik), a. [⟨ leucite + -ic.] Of or pertaining to leucite; containing or resembling leucite.

leucitite (lū′si-tīt), n. [⟨ leucite + *-ite*2.] The name given by Rosenbusch to varieties of leucite rock containing no olivin. Rocks of this type have been found in various parts of Italy, in the Cordilleran regions of the United States, and in the East Indies. Their composition is extremely variable, and they have not yet been fully worked out.

leucitoid (lū′si-toid), n. [⟨ leucite + Gr. εἶδος, form: see -oid.] In crystal., a tetragonal trisoctahedron, or trapezohedron: so called as being a common form of the mineral leucite.

leucitophyre (lū-sit′ō-fīr), n. [⟨ leucite + (por) phyr(y).] In petrog., a name which was originally given by Coquand (1857) to all igneous rocks bearing leucite. It is now more specifically used for phonolites containing both leucite and nepheline.

leucoblast (lū′kō-blâst), n. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + βλαστός, germ: see blastus.] A germinal leucocyte, or the germ of a leucocyte.

leucocarpous (lū-kō-kär′pus), a. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + καρπός, fruit.] Having white fruit.

leucocholy† (lū′kō-kol-i), n. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + χολή, bile: see *cholic*1. Cf. melancholy.] "White bile": a nonce-word, opposed to melancholy, "black bile."

> Mine . . . is a white Melancholy, or rather Leucocholy for the most part; which, though it seldom laughs or dances, nor ever amounts to what one calls Joy or Pleasure, yet is a good easy sort of a state. Gray, Letters, I. 113.

Leucocoryne (lū-kō-kor′i-nē), n. [NL. (Lindley, 1830), in allusion to the white flowers of some species, mounted on scapes; ⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + κορύνη, a club.] A genus of liliaceous plants of Chili, of the tribe Allieæ, or onion family. Three or four species are known, having narrowly linear, channeled, radical leaves, and simple leafless scapes bearing few white or blue flowers in terminal umbels. They are called white club-flower.

leucocyte (lū′kō-sīt), n. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + κύτος, a hollow.] A white or colorless corpuscle of the blood or lymph.

leucocythemia, leucocythæmia (lū″kō-sī-thē′mi-ą), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + κύτος, a hollow, + αἷμα, blood.] Same as leucemia.

leucocytic (lū-kō-sit′ik), a. [⟨ leucocyte + -ic.] 1. Pertaining to leucocytes.—2. Pertaining to an excess of leucocytes; leucemic.

leucocytogenesis (lū-kō-sī-tō-jen′e-sis), n. [NL., ⟨ leucocyte + Gr. γένεσις, production: see genesis.] The production of leucocytes, or white blood-corpuscles.

leucocytosis (lū″kō-sī-tō′sis), n. [NL., ⟨ leucocyte + -osis.] The presence of an excessive number of white corpuscles in the blood, especially when merely the result of temporary causes and not produced by grave disease.

leucodermia (lū-kō-dėr′mi-ą), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + δέρμα, skin: see derm.] Abnormal lack of pigment in the skin. Also written leucoderma, leukoderma, leukodermia.—Leucodermia acquisita, vitiligo.—Congenital leucodermia, albinism.

leucodermic (lū-kō-dėr′mik), a. [As leucodermia + -ic.] Pertaining to or exhibiting leucodermia.

leucœthiop (lū-sē′thi-op), n. Same as leucoëthiops.

leucoëthiop (lū-kō-ē′thi-op), n. [Also leucæthiop; ⟨ leucoëthiops.] Same as leucoëthiops.

leucoëthiopic (lū-kō-ē-thi-op′ik), a. [⟨ leucoëthiops + -ic.] Pertaining to a leucoëthiops or albino; pertaining to leucopathy.

leucoëthiops (lū-kō-ē′thi-ops), n.; pl. leucoëthiopes (lū-kō-ē-thī′ō-pēz). [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + Αἰθίοψ, an Ethiop, a negro: see Ethiops, Ethiop.] An individual of a dark-skinned race exhibiting albinism or a want of coloring matter in the skin and epidermic formations.

leucoindophenol (lū-kō-in-dō-fē′nol), n. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + E. indophenol.] Indophenol which has been reduced by glucose and caustic soda. It is a commercial article, forming a white paste soluble in pure and in acidified water. It is used in dyeing indigo-blue shades. Sometimes called indophenol white, or indophenol preparation.

Leucoium (lū-kō′i-um), n. [NL. (Linnæus), ⟨ L. leucoion, ⟨ Gr. λευκόϊον, name of several plants, the wallflower, snowflake, etc., lit. 'white violet,' ⟨ λευκός, white, + ἰον, violet.] A genus of plants of the family Amaryllidaceæ and tribe Amaryllideæ, distinguished by the long filaments and the equal segments of the perianth. There are 9 species. L. æstivum is the summer snowflake, and L. vernum the spring snowflake.

leucol (lū′kol), n. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + -ol.] An organic base obtained from coal-tar, identical with chinoline.

leucoline (lū′kō-lin), n. Same as leucol.

leucoma (lū-kō′mą), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λεύκωμα, a white spot in the eye, ⟨ λευκοῦν, whiten, ⟨ λευκός, white: see leucous.] In pathol., a white opacity of the cornea of the eye, the result of inflammation. Also called albugo.

leucomaine (lū-kō′mą-in), n. [Irreg. ⟨ Gr. λεύκωμα, whiteness, a white spot in the eye (see leucoma), + *-ine*2.] A nitrogenous organic base or alkaloid produced in living animal tissues as a result of their activity: distinguished from a ptomaine, which is an alkaloid produced in the putrefactive decay of a dead tissue.

leucomatous (lū-kom′a-tus), a. [⟨ NL. leucoma(t-) + -ous.] Pertaining to or exhibiting leucoma.

leucomelanous (lū-kō-mel′a-nus), a. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + μέλας (μελαν-), black.] Having a fair complexion with dark hair.

Leuconaria (lū-kō-nā′ri-ą), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Leucon(es) + -aria.] In Sollas's classification of sponges, a tribe of heterocœlous Calcispongiæ, embracing recent and fossil forms whose canal system is of the eurypylous rhagonate type, divided into Leuconidæ and Eilhardidæ.

leuconate (lū′kō-nāt), a. [⟨ Leucon(es) + *-ate*1.] Pertaining to the Leucones, or having their characters: as, a leuconate canal system; leuconate type of structure.

Leucones (lū-kō′nēz), n. pl. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λευκός, white: see leucous.] A group of the chalk-sponges, or Calcispongiæ, characterized first by great thickening of the ectodermal syncytium, so that the inhalent pores, such as exist in Ascones, lengthen into canals which may variously branch and anastomose, and secondly by final restriction to these canals of the endodermal cells, which at first form a continuous layer.

leucopathia (lū-kō-path′i-ą), n. [NL.: see leucopathy.] Same as leucopathy.

leucopathy (lū-kop′a-thi), n. [⟨ NL. leucopathia, ⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + πάθος, affection: see pathos.] 1. The condition of being an albino; albinism.—2. Same as chlorosis.

leucophane (lū′kō-fān), n. [⟨ MGr. λευκοφανής, appearing white, ⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + -φανής, ⟨ φαίνεσθαι, appear.] An imperfectly crystallized mineral, of a pale greenish or wine-yellow color. It is a fluosilicate of beryllium, calcium, and sodium, and is found in Norway. Also called leucophanite.

Leucophasia (lū-kō-fā′si-ą), n. [NL., ⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + φάσις, appearance: see phase.] A genus of pierian butterflies of the family Papilionidæ. Also called Leptidea. L. sinapis is a British species.

leucophilous (lū-kof′i-lus), a. [⟨ Gr. λευκός, white, + φίλος, loving.] Fond of light; light-loving; heliophilous.

leucophlegmacy† (lū-kō-fleg′mą-si), n. [⟨ Gr. λευκοφλεγματία (also λευκὸν φλέγμα), the dropsy, ⟨ λευκοφλέγματος, suffering from white phlegm, ⟨ λευκός, white, + φλέγμα, phlegm: see phlegm.] In pathol., an inferred tendency to a dropsical state, as indicated by paleness, flabbiness, or redundancy of serum in the blood.

leucophlegmatic† (lū″kō-fleg-mat′ik), a. [⟨ Gr. λευκοφλέγματος, suffering from white phlegm:

see leucophlegmacy.] Of, pertaining to, or affected with leucophlegmacy.

leucophyl, leucophyll (lū′kō-fil), n. [< Gr. λευκός, white, + φύλλον, leaf.] A chromogen believed to exist in the white corpuscles of an etiolated plant, which, under appropriate conditions, will give rise to chlorophyl. Sachs.

Leucophylleæ (lū-kō-fil′ē-ē), n. pl. [NL. (Bentham and Hooker, 1876), < Leucophyllum + -eæ.] A tribe of scrophulariaceous plants, typified by the genus Leucophyllum, and embracing two other genera, both of which may belong to Leucophyllum. More recent authors include this group in the larger tribe Verbasceæ.

Leucophyllum (lū-kō-fil′um), n. [NL. (Humboldt and Bonpland, 1809), < Gr. λευκός, white, + φύλλον, leaf.] A genus of plants of the family Scrophulariaceæ, type of the Leucophylleæ.

leucoplacia (lū-kō-plā′si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. λευκός, white, + πλάξ, anything flat and broad.] In pathol., the occurrence of chronic white patches on the tongue and buccal mucous membrane. There is inflammation of the corium, with hypertrophy and perversion of growth of the epithelium. Also called ichthyosis linguæ, tylosis linguæ, and psoriasis linguæ.

leucoplast, leucoplastid (lū′kō-plast, lū-kō-plas′tid), n. [< Gr. λευκός, white, + πλαστός, verbal adj. of πλάσσειν, form.] Same as amyloplast.

leucopterous (lū-kop′te-rus), a. [< Gr. λευκός, white, + πτερόν, a wing, = E. feather.] Having white wings. Thomas, Med. Dict.

leucopyrite (lū-kō-pī′rīt), n. [< Gr. λευκός, white, + E. pyrites.] A mineral (Fe_3As_4) of a color between white and steel-gray and of a metallic luster, consisting chiefly of arsenic and iron. It is related to loellingite ($FeAs_2$) and arsenopyrite (FeAsS or $FeAs_2.FeS_2$).

Leucorhamphus (lū-kō-ram′fus), n. [< Gr. λευκός, white, + ῥάμφος, beak, bill.] A genus of toothed cetaceans, of the family Delphinidæ, having no dorsal fin. These dolphins have hence been called Delphinapterus, but that name belongs to another genus. There are two species: L. peronii of the western coast of South America, black above and white below, with 44 teeth on each side of each jaw; and L. borealis of the same coast of North America, called the right-whale dolphin. See Delphinapterus, Delphinus.

leucorrhea, leucorrhœa (lū-kō-rē′ą), n. [NL. leucorrhœa, < Gr. λευκός, white, + ῥοία, a flowing, < ῥεῖν, flow.] In pathol., a mucous or mucopurulent discharge of a white color from the vagina; fluor albus; the whites. Also called blennelytria and colporrhea.

leucorrheal, leucorrhœal (lū-kō-rē′ąl), a. [< leucorrhea + -al.] Pertaining to or of the nature of leucorrhea: as, leucorrheal discharges.

leucoscope (lū′kō-skōp), n. [< Gr. λευκός, white, + σκοπεῖν, view.] An optical instrument for testing the eyes for color-blindness, devised by Helmholtz.

Leucosia (lū-kō′si-ą), n. [NL., < Gr. λεύκωσις, whiteness: see leucosis.] 1. The typical genus of Leucosiidæ. Fabricius, 1798.—2. A genus of mollusks.—3. A genus of bombycid moths of the family Liparidæ, based upon the European L. salicis. Rambur, 1869.

leucosian (lū-kō′si-ąn), n. and a. [< Leucosia + -an.] I. n. A crab of the family Leucosiidæ.

II. a. Resembling or related to crabs of the genus Leucosia; pertaining to the Leucosiidæ.

Leucosiidæ (lū-kō-sī′i-dē), n. pl. [NL., < Leucosia + -idæ.] A family of brachyurous decapod crustaceans, typified by the genus Leucosia, containing a number of genera of small crabs of compact rounded form and more or less porcellaneous test. Also Leucosiadæ.

leucosis (lū-kō′sis), n. [NL., < Gr. λεύκωσις, whiteness, < λευκοῦν, whiten, < λευκός, white: see leucous.] 1. Whiteness of skin; pallor.—2. The formation or progress of leucoma.

leucospermous (lū-kō-spėr′mus), a. [< Gr. λευκός, white, + σπέρμα, seed.] Having white fruit or seeds.

Leucospori (lū-kos′pō-rī), n. pl. [NL., < Gr. λευκός, white, + σπόρος, seed.] A series of species or genera of fungi having white spores. Applied especially to groups of the agarics.

Leucosticte (lū-kō-stik′tē), n. [NL. (Swainson, 1831), < Gr. λευκός, white, + στικτός, pricked, punctured, spotted, < στίζειν, prick, puncture: see stigma.] A notable genus of fringilline birds, having an oblique ridge on the under mandible, and the plumage more or less rosy or silvery-gray. There are several species, chiefly of western North America, known as rosy finches. The best-known is L. tephrocotis, which is of a rich chocolate-brown color, much of the plumage skirted with a rosy tint, the ears silvery-gray, and the cap black. Its length is about 6½ inches.

leucostine (lū-kos′tin), n. [< Gr. λευκός, white, + ὀστ(έον), bone (?), + *-ine*2.] Dolomieu's name for phonolite, trachyte, and andesite.

Leucothoë (lū-koth′ō-ē), n. [NL. (D. Don, 1834), < L. Leucothoë, < Gr. Λευκοθόη, daughter of Orchamus, King of Babylon, and Eurynome.] A genus of ericaceous plants of the tribe Andromedeæ. The imbricated calyx does not become berry-like in the fruit, and the seeds are winged. There are about 35 species, shrubs with petioled, serrulate leaves and axillary or terminal spiked racemes of white waxy flowers gracefully arranged along the under side of the branches, natives of North and South America, Japan, and the Himalayas. Some of the species are ornamental, and known in gardens. L. acuminata of the South Carolina and Florida coast is called pipewood. More than 30 fossil species of Leucothoë occur in the Tertiary deposits of Europe, Greenland, and Alaska, and one in the Dakota group (Middle Cretaceous) of Nebraska.

leucous (lū′kus), a. [< Gr. λευκός, light, bright, white, akin to L. lucere, be light, and to E. *light*1, q. v.] Light-colored; white; affected with leucism; albinotic: applied specifically to albinos.

leucoxene (lū′kok-sēn), n. [< Gr. λευκός, white, + ξένος, a guest.] An opaque white substance often observed in thin sections of rocks, derived from the alteration of titanic iron. It is, sometimes at least, identical with titanite in composition.

leud†, leude†, a. Middle English forms of lewd.

leugh (lyuċh or lyöċh). A dialectal (Scotch) preterit of laugh.

leuket, a. An obsolete spelling of *luke*1.

leukoderma, leukodermia, n. See leucodermia.

leun†, n. A Middle English form of lion.

leuse†, v. An obsolete irregular spelling of loose. Elyot.

leute†, leutee†, n. Middle English forms of lealty.

leuzern†, n. A variant of *lucern*2.

Lev. An abbreviation of Leviticus.

levant1 (lev′ant), a. and n. [< OF. levant, F. levant, a., rising, < L. levan(t-)s, ppr. of levare, raise, refl. se levare, rise, < levis, light, not heavy (whence also ult. E. *lever*1, levity, *levee*1, *levee*2, *levy*1, *levy*2, alleviate, *allege*2, elevate, relevant, relieve, relief, etc.), akin to E. *light*2, q. v. Hence *levant*2, *levant*3.] I. a. 1†. Rising. Minsheu, 1617; Phillips, 1706.—2†. Eastern; coming from the direction in which the sun rises.

> Forth rush the Levant and the Ponent winds, > Eurus and Zephyr. Milton, P. L., x. 704.

3. [cap.] In geol., appellative of the fourth of Professor H. Rogers's fifteen divisions of the Paleozoic strata in the Appalachian chain, the names of which suggest metaphorically the different natural periods of the day. It is the equivalent of the lower part of the Upper Silurian, and represents the Oneida conglomerate and Medina sandstone of the New York Survey. See Medina sandstone, under sandstone.—Levant and couchant, in law. See couchant.

★ II. n. Same as lavant. [Local, Eng.]

levant2 (lē-vant′), n. and a. [= D. levant = G. levante = Dan. Sw. levant, < F. levant = Sp. Pg. It. levante, < ML. levan(t-)s, the sunrise, the east, the orient, prop. adj., rising, applied to the sun: see *levant*1.] I. n. 1. [cap.] The region east of Italy lying on and near the Mediterranean, sometimes reckoned as extending east to the Euphrates and as taking in the Nile valley, thus including Greece and Egypt; more specifically, the coast-region and islands of Asia Minor and Syria: a name originally given by the Italians.—2. An easterly wind blowing up the Mediterranean; a levanter.

> The Maestrale, the Bora, the Gregala, and the Levante, are polar currents [of wind]—the first about north-west the second north, and the other two with more or less easting. Fitz Roy, Weather Book, p. 141.

3. Same as levant morocco.—Cloth of Levant†, a cosmetic used by ladies in the sixteenth century. Nares.

> To make a kind of . . . cloth of Levant, wherewith women do use to colour their face. Secretes of Alexis.

II. a. Of or pertaining to or obtained from the Levant.—Levant fever. See *fever*1.—Levant morocco, in bookbinding, morocco of superior quality, having a large and prominent grain. It was originally made in the Levant, from the skins of Angora goats.

levant3 (lē-vant′), v. [< Sp. levantar, raise, move, remove (levantar la casa, break up house, levantar el campo, break up camp), < levar, llevar, now llevar, raise, carry, < L. levare, raise: see *levant*1, n.] I. intrans. To run away; decamp.

> When he found she'd levanted, the Count of Alsace
> At first turned remarkably red in the face.
> Barham, Ingoldsby Legends, I. 244.

II.† trans. Used only in the imperative, in the exclamatory phrase levant me, a mild imprecation much like blow me! [Low.]

> Levant me, but he got enough last night to purchase a principality amongst his countrymen. Foote, The Minor, i.

levant3† (lē-vant′), n. [< *levant*3, v.] A bet made by one who expects to evade paying if he loses.—To throw or run a levant†, to bet without intention to pay. [Slang.]

> Crowd to the hazard table, throw a familiar levant upon some sharp lurching man of quality, and, if he demands his money, turn it off with a loud laugh.
> Cibber, Provoked Husband, i. (Davies.)

levanter1 (lē-van′tėr), n. [< *levant*2, n., + *-er*2.] An easterly wind blowing up the Mediterranean from the direction of the Levant.

> Let them not break prison to burst like a levanter, to sweep the earth with their hurricane.
> Burke, Rev. in France.

levanter2 (lē-van′tėr), n. [< *levant*3, v., + *-er*1.] 1. One who levants; one who runs away disgracefully. Specifically—2. One who bets at a horse-race, and runs away without paying the wager lost. [Slang in both senses.]

levantine (lev′an-tin or lē-van′tin), a. and n. [= F. levantin (= Pg. Sp. It. levantino), pertaining to the Levant (fem. levantine, a silk cloth), < levant, the Levant: see *levant*2, n.] I. a. 1†. Eastern; Oriental.

> They [the seeds of Platanus] should be gathered late in Autumn, and brought us from some more levantine parts than Italy. Evelyn, Sylva, xxii.

2. [cap.] Of or pertaining to the Levant.—3. Designating a particular kind of silk cloth. See II., 3.

II. n. 1. [cap.] A native or an inhabitant of the Levant.—2. [cap.] A vessel belonging to the Levant.—3. A rich and stout silk material, characterized by having two faces of different colors or shades. Dict. of Needlework.

levari facias (lē-vā′rī fā′shi-as). [L. (NL.), cause to be levied: levari, pass. of levare, raise (see *levy*1); facias, 2d pers. sing. pres. subj. (with impv. force) of facere, do, cause: see fact.] In law, a writ of execution issued to the sheriff, commanding him to levy the amount of a judgment out of the goods, etc., of the debtor.

levation† (lē-vā′shọn), n. [= OF. levation = It. levazione, < L. levatio(n-), a raising, < levare, pp. levatus, raise: see *levant*1.] The act of raising; elevation; especially, the elevation of the Host.

> Kneling, knocking on brestes, and holding vp of handes at the sight of the levacion. Sir T. More, Works, p. 890.

> By his gesture he will behave himself in such sort as rather shall make men the less to regard the mass, for he will not look up at the levation time, hold up his hands, nor strike his hands on his face.
> J. Bradford, Works (Parker Soc., 1853), II. 302.

★ levator (lē-vā′tọr), n.; pl. levatores (lev-ą-tō′rēz). [L., a lifter, < levare, raise: see *levant*1. Cf. *lever*1, ult. < L. levator.] 1. In anat., that which raises or elevates, as various muscles of the human body: opposed to depressor.—2. A surgical instrument used to raise a depressed part of the skull.—Levator anguli oris, the lifter of the angle of the mouth. Also called canine muscle.—Levator anguli scapulæ, the lifter of the angle of the scapula: in man, a distinct muscle arising from the cervical region of the spine and inserted into the scapula; in some animals, a part of the serratus magnus, as in the opossum.—Levator ani, the lifter of the anus, a sheet of muscular tissue chiefly forming the floor of the pelvic cavity.—Levator arcuum, in some of the lower vertebrates, as Menobranchus, one of the muscles suspending branchial arches to the parts above them.—Levator clavicula, the lifter of the clavicle, a muscle of many animals, not normally found in man, extending from the occipital bone and attached to the metacromion of the scapula. Also called trachelo-acromialis.—Levator coccygis, the lifter of the coccyx, a considerable muscle having the office implied in the name, proceeding from the pelvis to the coccyx, and belonging to the general series of extensor muscles of the spine. It is well marked, for example, in birds.—Levatores costarum, twelve muscles on each side of the spine. Each passes from the transverse process of a vertebra to the rib below, being inserted between the tubercle and the angle. They raise the ribs.—Levator glandulæ thyreideæ, a muscle which occasionally passes from the hyoid bone to the thyroid gland.—Levator humeri proprius, the proper elevator of the humerus, a muscle of some animals, as the dog, resulting from union of fibers of the deltoid and sternomastoid, when the latter coalesces with the trapezius.—Levator labii inferioris, the elevator of the lower lip and chin, causing the lip to protrude, as in pouting. Also called levator menti.—Levator labii superioris, the elevator of the upper lip, exposing the canine teeth, as in grinning. From its action in dogs, it is sometimes called the snarling-muscle.—Levator labii superioris alæque nasi, the lifter of the upper lip and nostril, as in sneering; the sneering-muscle.—Levator menti. Same as levator labii inferioris.—Levator palati, the lifter of the soft palate, bounding the posterior naris externally, arising from the apex of the petrous portion of the temporal bone, and inserted with its fellow into the median line of the palate.—Levator palpebræ superioris, the lifter of the upper eyelid, antagonizing the orbicularis palpebrarum.—Levator proprius alæ nasi, the lifter of the nostril; the dilatator naris, anterior or posterior.—Levator prostatæ, the lifter of the prostate gland, the anterior part of the levator ani, passing from the pubic ramus to the side of the prostate, and thence under the gland to a median raphe in front of the anus.

levet†. An obsolete variant of leave[1], leave[2], leeve, live[1], and lief.

levecel†, n. A variant of lefesel.

leved†, a. A Middle English form of leafed.

levedy†, n. A Middle English form of lady.

levee[1] (le-vē′ or lev′ē), n. [< F. levée, a raising, ★embanking, embankment, a levy (also formerly a rising, as of the sun): see levy[1], the naturalized form of the word in E.] 1. An embankment on the margin of a river, to confine it within its natural channel: as, the levees of the Mississippi.

On the 15th of November, he had completed in front of New Orleans a levee, of eighteen hundred yards in length, and so broad that its summit measured eighteen feet in width. Gayarré, Hist. Louisiana, I. 382.

Hence—2. A landing-place for vessels; a quay, pier, or landing-stage. [Southern and western U. S. in both senses.]

levee[1] (le-vē′ or lev′ē), v. t. [< levee[1], n.] To embank: as, to levee a river. [U. S.]

levee[2] (le-vē′ or lev′ē), n. [< F. lever (pron. le-vā′), a rising (of the sun), a rising (from bed), a morning reception (on rising), < lever, raise, refl. rise: see levant[1]. The spelling levee was orig. intended to represent the F. pron. of lever. The word does not come from F. levée, which has not the meaning 'a reception.'] 1†. The act or time of rising.

Nothing is more alluring than a Levee from a Couch in some Confusion. Congreve, Way of the World, iv. 1.

I set out one morning before five o'clock, . . . and got to the sea-coast time enough to be at the sun's levee. Gray, To Mr. Nicholls.

2. A morning reception held by a prince or great personage; a morning assembly. The term is chiefly applied in Great Britain to the stated public occasions on which the sovereign receives such persons as are entitled by rank or favor to the honor. It is distinguished from a drawing-room in the respect that, whereas at a levee men alone appear (with the exception of the chief ladies of the court), both women and men attend a drawing-room. In old French usage, a levee (lever) was a reception of nobles by the king on his rising from bed, or during or immediately after the making of his toilet.

I humbly conceive the business of a levee is to receive the acknowledgments of a multitude. Spectator, No. 193.

Of the three levees in this street, the greatest is in this house. Walpole, To Mann, Nov. 30, 1743.

That 4th of August was the eve of Louis XVI.'s last levee —a brilliant spectacle, through which sad presages were felt and seen in many hearts and eyes. E. Dowden, Shelley, I. 7.

3. A general or miscellaneous assemblage of guests, without reference to the time of day; a reception: as, the president's levee.

He [Brougham] had a levee the other night, which was brilliantly attended—the archbishops, Duke of Wellington, Lord Grey, a host of people. Greville, Memoirs, March 15, 1831.

levee[2] (le-vē′ or lev′ē), v. t. [< levee[2], n.] To attend the levee of; fasten one's self on, or pester, at levees. [Rare.]

Warm in pursuit, he levees all the great. Young.

leveful†, a. [Also leeful, leful; < leve, now leave[2], permission, + -ful. In the form leeful, leful, appar. confused with lawful.] Allowable; permissible; lawful.

For leveful is with force force of showve. Chaucer, Prol. to Reeve's Tale, l. 58.

Rich men sayen that it is both lefull and needfull to them ★to gather riches together. Fox, p. 372. (Nares.) level[1] (lev′el), n. and a. [< ME. level, levell, livel, < OF. livel, liveau, leveal, later nivel, niveau, F. niveau (dial. leveau, lèvai, livé) = Sp. nivel, nivello = Pg. livel, nivel = It. livello, < L. libella, a balance, a level, dim. of libra, a balance, a level: see libra, librate[1], etc.] I. n. 1. An instrument for determining the plane of the horizon, or the plane perpendicular to the direction in which bodies fall under the action of gravity. The simplest instrument used for this purpose is the plumb-line. This is now superseded for most purposes by the bubble- or spirit-level, which consists of a frame of some kind firmly holding a glass tube, closed at the ends, nearly filled with anhydrous ether or a mixture of ether and alcohol, and having its inner surface on the upper part ground into the form of the outer part of an anchor-ring. Fine levels have besides a graduated scale either on the glass or on a metallic rule set against it, so as to mark the precise position of the bubble. Most fine levels are provided with a chamber so contrived that the length of the bubble can be altered. The spirit-level is usually reversed in use, and the mean of its two indications adopted. The spirit-level is an attachment of most geodetical instruments; and there is a special instrument called a level or leveling-instrument (which see).

a, end view; b, side view (part shown in section).

Spirit-level, mounted for surveying.

Of alle kyne craftes ich contreeuede here tooles . . .
And cast out by squire both lyne and leuell.
Piers Plowman (C), xii. 127.

In her lap she held a perpendicular or level, as the ensign of evenness and rest. B. Jonson, King James's Coronation Entertainment.

2. An imaginary surface everywhere perpendicular to the plumb-line, or line of gravity, so that it might be the free surface of a liquid at rest. Every such surface is approximately that of an oblate spheroid, as the sea-level, for example, is; but for most of the purposes of ordinary life it is convenient, and occasions no sensible error, to confound this surface with its tangent plane at the point referred to—the plane of its horizon. The vertical distance from any given lower level (in the stricter sense of the word), A, to a given higher level, B, will vary with the latitude; but the work required to raise a given weight from A to B is everywhere the same. The level or horizontal surface is ordinarily spoken of as belonging to anything lying or moving upon it, or to a liquid whose free surface in equilibrium will coincide with a portion of it, and frequently indicates, in addition, some reference to some other object having the same or a different vertical elevation. Thus, we speak of the level of a station (often with reference to some standard of elevation), or of the level of the sea; a liquid is spoken of as finding its level; A is said to be on a level with B, or A and B are on a level or on the same level.

Each place is alternately elevated and depressed; but the ocean preserves its level. J. S. Mill, Pol. Econ., III. iii. § 1.

The highest flood-mark was on a level with the terrace round the house. Mrs. Oliphant, Poor Gentleman, xiv.

Hence—3. Figuratively, degree of elevation as regards standing, condition, or action; a height reached or aimed at, from a social, intellectual, or moral point of view. The idea of comparison, relativity, or parallelism is prominent in this as in the literal signification of the word; and a natural or normal level is often spoken of, after the analogy of a free liquid surface.

It was no little satisfaction to me to view the mixed mass of all ages and dignities upon a level, partaking of the same benefits of nature. Steele, Guardian, No. 174.

Foppish airs
And histrionic mummery, that let down
The pulpit to the level of the stage.
Cowper, Task, ii. 564.

When merit shall find its level. F. W. Robertson.

A common level of interests and social standing fostered unconventional ways of thought and speech, and friendly human sympathies. Lowell, Among my Books, 2d ser., p. 205.

4. An extent of land-surface approximately horizontal and unbroken by irregularities; a plain.

We rode a league beyond,
And, o'er a bridge of pinewood crossing, came
On flowery levels underneath the crag,
Full of all beauty. Tennyson, Princess, iii.

5. The point-blank aim of a missile weapon, including the line of fire and the range or distance the missile is carried without deflection; hence, purpose; aim.

As if that name,
Shot from the deadly level of a gun,
Did murder her. Shak., R. and J., iii. 3. 103.

Bring me within the level of your frown,
But shoot not at me in your waken'd hate.
Shak., Sonnets, cxvii.

Be the fair Level of thy Actions laid
As Temp'rance wills, and Prudence may persuade.
Prior, Solomon, iii.

6. In mining, a drift or nearly horizontal excavation made in opening a mine. Levels are run to connect shafts and winzes, so as to open and make ready for stoping a certain amount of ground. In a mine regularly opened on a permanent vein, the levels are usually from 60 to 100 feet apart, but vary in position with the varying richness of the lode.

7. A leveling-instrument. See clinometer-level and leveling-instrument.—Aitø's level, a modified water-level, in which the horizontal part of the tube is replaced by long india-rubber tubing, for carrying lines of level round corners.—Blind level. See blind[1].—Bricklayers' level, a plummet attached to a wooden T having a line through the attachment of the plumb-line perpendicular to the edge of the wood.—Carpenters' level. Same as bricklayers' level.—Day level, in mining, a level open to the surface at the side of a valley. Most mines have, when possible, at least one such level for drainage. Also called adit or sough.—Dead level, a stretch of land without hills, and very nearly horizontal; hence, absolute uniformity; unvarying sameness; monotony.

We bring to one dead level every mind.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 268.

All unnecessary rises and falls [in roads] should be avoided, but a dead level is unfavorable for drainage. Encyc. Brit., XX. 582.

Flying level, in engin., a trial leveling over the track of a projected road, railroad, or canal, to ascertain the fitness of the ground.—Gunners' level, a brass instrument with a steel sliding arm and a spirit-level, used for obtaining the line of sighting-points on a gun.—Hand-level, in mining, a level about four feet high and three feet wide, giving just room for a man to pass through in a constrained position, pushing a little wagon called a driving-wagon. [Yorkshire, Eng.]—Line and level. See line[2].—Lines of level, lines on a map representing the intersections of the surface of the ground with level surfaces; contour-lines.—Locke level (invented by John Locke), a tube, like a small spy-glass, held in the hand, and so contrived that when the bubble occupies the center of a small mirror within the tube, the axis of the instrument, the position of which is indicated by a cross-hair in the field, is level. This instrument, which is extremely convenient for field geologists, is used for getting the height of slopes of moderate extent by holding the instrument to the eye, noting the point in the ascending slope where, when the instrument is level, the cross-hair strikes the ground, then walking to that and repeating the process, until the spot is reached of which the height is desired. The result is given by multiplying the height of the observer's eye above the ground by the number of stations. Of course the instrument can be used only on a continuously ascending grade.—Masons' level. Same as plummet-level.—Mercurial level, a fluid-level in which mercury serves in place of water or alcohol in the tube or trough.—Reflecting level. Same as Locke level.—Self-recording level, a machine which when passed over the ground makes a profile or vertical section of a line of survey; a grade-indicator.—Surveyors' level, a telescope with a spirit-level attached, for measuring differences of elevation, in connection with a leveling-staff. For the Gravatt surveyors' level, see dumpy-level.—Water-level, a horizontal tube with two upright branches, mounted on a tripod, and partly filled with water, so that one can sight across from the surface of the water in one upright branch to that in the other. (See also artillery-level, batter-level, foot-level, Y-level.)

Gravatt's Surveyors' Level.

II. a. 1. Lying in or constituting a horizontal surface; not having one part higher than another; horizontally even or flat; not sloping: as, level ground; a level floor or pavement.

The .iiij. syde lyeth to the moûtayne warde, and that nedeth no walle, and it is dressed so yt it is leuell aboue and voughted thrughout vnder nethe. Sir R. Guylforde, Pylgrymage, p. 34.

O God! that one might read the book of fate,
And see the revolution of the times
Make mountains level. Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iii. 1. 47.

In the more level parts of Navarin Island, these bands of stratification were nearly horizontal. Darwin, Geol. Observations, ii. 448.

2. Lying in such a surface that no work is gained or lost in the transportation of a particle from any one point of it to any other; equipotential.—3. Existing or acting in the same plane or course; continuing without change of relative elevation; even with something else.

Now shaves with level wing the deep, then soars
Up to the fiery concave towering high.
Milton, P. L., ii. 634.

Round and full the glorious sun
Walks with level steps the spray,
Through his vestibule of Day.
B. Taylor, Ariel in the Cloven Pine.

Its [Scripture] having some things in it hard to be understood implies that it has but some, and that most things in it are easy to be understood, lie open and level to the meanest understandings. Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, II. ix.

Where Pope, as in the "Rape of the Lock," found a subject exactly level with his genius, he was able to make what, taken for all in all, is the most perfect poem in the language. Lowell, Study Windows, p. 432.

The light thrilled towards her, fill'd
With angels in strong level flight.
D. G. Rossetti, The Blessed Damozel.

4. With reference to color, especially in dyeing, even; unbroken; uniform.

The perfection of cotton dyeing is to produce on these warps the same tone and depth of colour as are found on the worsted, so that the entire piece may appear level, and free from any checky character. Workshop Receipts, 2d ser., p. 222.

5. Equal in rank or degree.

And your conceal'd sins, though you work like moles,
Lie level to their justice.
Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, i. 1.

Be level in preferments, and you will soon be as level in your learning. Bentley.

6. Well-aimed; direct; straight; in a right line; conformable.

Everything lies level to our wish.
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., iv. 4. 7.

Level as a cannon to its blank. Shak., Hamlet, iv. 1. 42.

7. Steady; in equipoise. [Rare.]

It is not a confident brow, nor the throng of words that come . . . from you, can thrust me from a level consideration [of the justice of a cause].
Shak., 2 Hen. IV., ii. 1. 124.

8. Well-balanced; of good judgment: as, a level head. [Colloq. or slang, U. S.]

There is a strong suspicion among men whose heads are level that this . . . performance is a bluff.
Bret Harte, Gabriel Conroy, xxxix.

Level crossing. Same as grade-crossing (which see, under crossing).—Level surface. Same as equipotential surface (which see, under equipotential).—To do one's level best, to do one's utmost. [Slang, U. S.]

"Now you have a position in society, you must assist in all good objects." . . . I said, "I'll do my Level Best, Doctor."
E. E. Hale, His Level Best.

=Syn. 1 and 2. Level, Flat, Even. In regard to the surface of land, flat is a depreciative word, indicating lowness or unattractiveness, or both; level conveys no slur, and is entirely consistent with beauty: as, flat marshes; level prairies. Flat is a rather more absolute word than level. That which is flat or level is parallel to the horizon; that which is even is free from inequalities: as, an even ★slope.

level[1] (lev'el), v.; pret. and pp. leveled or levelled, ppr. leveling or levelling. [< level[1], n.] I. trans. 1. To make horizontal; bring into a plane parallel to the horizon, as by the use of a leveling-instrument: as, to level a billiard-table.—2. To reduce or remove inequalities of surface in; make even or smooth: as, to level a road or walk.—3. To reduce or bring to the same height as something else; lay flat; especially, to bring down to the ground; prostrate.

All things were levelled by the deluge.
Bacon, Physical Fables, ix.

4. To reduce to equality of condition, state, or degree; bring to a common level or standing in any respect: as, to level ranks of society.

To level him with a headborough, beadle, or watchman, were but little better than he is; constable I'll able him.
Middleton, Changeling, i. 2.

This sense of mankind is so far from a levelling principle that it only sets us upon a true basis of distinction, and doubles the merit of such as become their condition.
Steele, Tatler, No. 69.

5. To direct to an object, in a particular line, or toward a purpose; point or aim.

For all his minde on honour fixed is,
To which he levels all his purposis.
Spenser, Mother Hub. Tale, l. 772.

The setting sun . . .
Against the eastern gate of Paradise
Levell'd his evening rays. Milton, P. L., iv. 543.

Such is the clamour of rooks, daws, and kites,
Th' explosion of the levell'd tube excites.
Cowper, Hope, l. 350.

6. To adapt; suit; proportion: as, to level observations to the capacity of children.—7. In surv., to find the level or the relative elevation of by observation or measurement.

An ancient river-bed in the desert . . . will soon be levelled throughout its extent, and the conflict of opinion be settled by . . . a careful survey. Science, VI. 516.

8. In dyeing, to make smooth and uniform. See level[1], a., 4.

This liquid [tartar] is employed by some dyers for levelling certain colours. W. Crookes, Dyeing, etc., p. 549.

To level down or up, to lower or raise to the same level or status—to level up being used specifically of raising a lower person or class to the level of a higher.

Sir, your levellers wish to level down as far as themselves; but they cannot bear levelling up to themselves.
Johnson, in Boswell, an. 1763.

=Syn. 3. To raze, destroy, demolish.

II. intrans. 1. To be in the same direction with something; be aimed. [Rare.]

He to his engine flew, . . .
And rais'd it till it levell'd right
Against the glow-worm tail of kite.
S. Butler, Hudibras, II. iii. 443.

2. To point a weapon at the mark; take aim: as, he leveled and fired; hence, to direct a purpose; aim.

Thou loucly Venus:
With thy blind boy that almost neuer misses,
But hits our hartes when he leuels at vs.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 147.

Ambitious York did level at thy crown.
Shak., 3 Hen. VI., ii. 2. 19.

He lifts the tube, and levels with his eye;
Straight a short thunder breaks the frozen sky.
Pope, Windsor Forest, l. 129.

3†. To conjecture; attempt to guess.

So cunning that you can leuell at the dispositions of women whom you neuer knew.
Lyly, Euphues and his England, p. 289.

Bravest at the last,
She levell'd at our purposes, and, being royal,
Took her own way. Shak., A. and C., v. 2. 339.

4. To accord; agree; suit. [Rare.]

Such accommodation and besort
As levels with her breeding.
Shak., Othello, i. 3. 239.

5. To work with a leveling-instrument; make the observations necessary for constructing a profile or vertical section of any line on the earth's surface, or for ascertaining the difference of elevation between two or more stations.

level[2]†, v. A corruption of levy[1].

From taking leuell by vnlawfull measure.
Breton, Pasquil's Precession, p. 8. (Davies.) level-coil† (lev'el-koil), n. [Formerly also levell-coyle; an accom. form of OF. leve-cul, a game so called (see the def.), < lever, raise, + cul, buttock (< L. culus, the posteriors); lever le cul, in slang use, rise.] 1. An old Christmas game in which one player hunted another, the loser giving up his seat to the winner.

May we play not Levet-coyl [read level-coyl]? I have not patience to stay till another match be made.
Shuffling [etc.] in a Game at Picquet (1659), p. 5.

Hence—2. Riotous sport of any kind.

Young Justice Bramble has kept level coyl
Here in our quarters, stole away our daughter.
B. Jonson, Tale of a Tub, iii. 2.

Tav. How now! what coil is here?
Black. Level-coil, you see, every man's pot.
Beau. and Fl. (?), Faithful Friends, i. 2.

level-dyeing (lev'el-dī″ing), n. The process of dyeing evenly where, from the great affinity between the goods and the dye, the portion first dyed would absorb too much coloring matter. It is usually accomplished by adding to the bath a quan★tity of crystallized sulphate of soda (Glauber's salts).

leveler, leveller (lev'el-ėr), n. 1. One who levels or makes even; one who or that which brings or reduces to a level, or destroys by leveling: as, time is the great leveler.—2. One who desires or strives to bring men to a common level; one who would level social distinctions, or who disregards differences of rank or status.

Its structure strongly proves the truth of the maxim that princes are true levellers—real republicans—among themselves. Brougham.

3. [cap.] One of a party which arose in the army of the Long Parliament about 1647. They professed a determination to level all ranks and establish equality in titles and estates throughout the kingdom. They were put down by Fairfax.

They were termed levellers upon a pretended principle which they espoused, to endeavour to obtain such an equal righteous distribution of justice in government to all degrees of people that it should not be in the power of the highest to oppress their inferiors, nor should the meanest of the people be out of capacity to arrive at the greatest office and dignity in the state. Baker, Charles II., an. 1649.

4. A screw or other device fitted to the leg of a billiard-table or to any piece of apparatus for adjusting the table or apparatus to a true level.—5. An earth-scraper.

levelessł, a. A variant of leaveless[1].

level-headed (lev'el-hed″ed), a. Sensible; shrewd. [Colloq. or slang.]

It is to be regretted that the State Department loses the services of so competent and level-headed a chief.
★ The American, XIV. 341.

leveling, levelling (lev'el-ing), n. [Verbal n. of level[1], v.] 1. The act or process of reducing an uneven surface to a level or plane.—2. The art or operation of ascertaining the different elevations of objects on the surface of the earth; the art or practice of finding how much any assigned point on the earth's surface included in a survey is higher or lower than another assigned point. It is a branch of surveying of great importance in making roads, determining the proper lines for railways, conducting water, draining low grounds, rendering rivers navigable, forming canals, and the like. The instruments commonly employed are a level or leveling-instrument and a pair of leveling-staffs. One of the staffs is held up vertically, resting upon the ground at the initial point. The observer then goes forward with his instrument for a convenient distance, makes his telescope level, and directs the rod-man to raise or lower the target until it is at the height of the telescope. This is called a back-sight. The height of the target on the rod is now read. The other rod has meantime been carried forward, and is observed in the same manner. This is called a fore sight. The instrument is now carried forward and a back-sight is made on the last rod. When a bench-mark or other terminus is reached, all the fore-sights are added together, as well as all the back-sights, and the difference of the sums is the difference of elevation.

leveling-block (lev'el-ing-blok), n. In iron ship-building, a cast-iron platform made up of large rectangular castings having as many holes with centers from four to five inches apart cast in them as the castings can contain. The faces of the blocks are level. Pins with eccentric disks fitted to their heads are inserted into the holes. The disks have holes arranged with different degrees of eccentricity. The block or platform is used for bending frames, etc. A mold, to the form of which a frame is to be bent, is laid upon the block, and its form is traced by a chalk-mark. The pins are then arranged in the holes so that the heated iron frame may be bent upon them into the form of the trace. The temperature of the heating is indicated by orange-red; and by the use of various tools, with the pins and eccentric disks, the frame is quickly and accurately bent to the form of the trace.

leveling-instrument (lev'el-ing-in″strŏ-ment), n. An instrument for use in surveying, of different forms, but consisting essentially of a telescope carrying a parallel, rigidly connected, and sensitive spirit-level. The telescope is mounted on a stable stand, and is capable of adjustment in all directions by means of screws.

Leveling-instrument.

leveling-plow (lev'el-ing-plou), n. A plow adapted for leveling the ridges thrown up in some forms of cultivation in rows.

leveling-pole, leveling-rod (lev'el-ing-pōl, -rod), n. Same as leveling-staff, 1.

leveling-screw (lev'el-ing-skrŏ), n. 1. In a mill, a screw in the hurst or frame on which a run of millstones is placed, used to give a vertical adjustment and bring it to an exact level. It acts against an iron plate set in a bedstone.—2. In a surveying or portable astronomical instrument, any one of the screws used for leveling the horizontal plate or that part of the instrument on which the horizontal angles are read off. In most English theodolites and leveling-instruments there are two pairs of leveling-screws; in French and German instruments usually only three screws.

Leveling-staff (def. 2).

leveling-staff (lev'el-ing-stȧf), n. 1. An instrument used in leveling, in conjunction with a leveling-instrument or with a spirit-level and a telescope. It is variously constructed, but consists essentially of a graduated pole with a vane sliding upon it so as to mark the height at any distance above the ground. See leveling, 2. Also called leveling-pole, leveling-rod, station-pole, or station-staff.
2. An instrument used to support a glass plate horizontally so that it can retain a fluid upon its upper surface. It is usually in the form of a tripod fitted with adjusting-screws or levelers.

levelism (lev'el-izm), n. [< level[1] + -ism.] The leveling of distinctions in society, or the principle or doctrine of such leveling. [Rare.]

leveller, levelling. See leveler, leveling.

levelly (lev'el-li), adv. In a level manner; evenly; equally. [Rare.]

Neither would praises and actions appear so levelly concurrent in many other of the Grecians as they do in these.
Hobbes, tr. of Thucydides, ii.

levelness (lev'el-nes), n. The condition of being level; evenness; equality.

The river Tiber is expressed lying along, for so you must remember to draw rivers, to express their levelness with the earth. Peacham, Drawing.

level-suseł, level-siceł, n. [Appar. < OF. lever, raise, + sus, upon, over. Cf. level-coil.] Same as level-coil. Skelton.

By tragick deaths device Ambitious hearts do play at level-sice.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Decay.

leven[1] (lev'n), n. [Early mod. E. also levin, leaven; < ME. levene, levyn, lightning. No appar. source in AS., connection with AS. līg, lēg (E. lay[8]), lightning, AS. līget, lēget (E. lait[1]), lightning, AS. leóht (E. light[1]), light, or with leóma (E. leam[1]), gleam, being phonetically improbable.] Lightning. [Obsolete or archaic.]

With wilde thonder dynt and firy levene
Moote thy welked nekke be to-broke.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 276.

As when the flashing Levin haps to light Upon two stubborne oakes.
Spenser, F. Q., V. vi. 40.

In Sinai's wilderness he saw
The Mount, where Israel heard the law,
Mid thunder-dint, and flashing levin.
Scott, Marmion, I. 23.

leven[1]†, v. [Early mod. E. also leaven; < ME. levenen, levynen, < levene, lightning: see leven[1], n.] I. trans. To smite with lightning.

II. intrans. To flash; shine like lightning.

Thonret full throly with a thicke haile;
With a leuenyng light as a low fyre,
Blaset all the brode see as it bren wold.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 1983.

leven[2]†, n. An obsolete form of leaven.

leven[3] (lev'n), n. [Origin obscure.] A lawn; an open space between or among woods. [Scotch.]

And see ye not that braid braid road,
That lies across that lily leven?
Thomas the Rhymer (Child's Ballads, I. 111).

leven-brand†, n. A bolt of lightning.

His burning levin-brond in hand he tooke.
Spenser, F. Q., VII. vi. 30.

leveningt†, n. [Early mod. E. also leavening; < ME. levening, levenynge; verbal n. of leven[1], v.] Lightning.

Sins that the fire of gods and king of men
Strake me with thonder, and with leauening blast.
Surrey, Æneid, ii.

★ lever[1] (lev'ėr or lē'vėr), n. [Formerly also leaver; < ME. lever, levour, a lever, < OF. leveor, leveur, F. leveur, a lifter, a lever (also OF. and F. levier, a lever, with diff. suffix), < L. levator, a lifter, < levare, pp. levatus, raise: see levant[1].] 1. A simple machine, consisting of a bar or rigid piece of any shape, acted upon at different points by two forces which severally tend to rotate it in opposite directions about a fixed axis. The bearing of this axis is called the fulcrum; of the two forces, one, conceived as something to be balanced or overcome, is termed the resistance, load, or weight, while the other, conceived as voluntarily applied, is termed the power. These are understood to act in the plane of rotation, and each perpendicularly to the line joining the point of its application to the fixed axis. The lengths of these two lines are termed the arms of the lever. If the load is ten times as great as the power, but the power is ten times as far from the fulcrum as the load is from the fulcrum—or, generally, if the two forces are inversely as their respective arms—then the lever is in equilibrium. This principle, beautifully demonstrated by Archimedes, was adopted by Lagrange as one of the two fundamental principles of statics, the other being the principle of the inclined plane. A lever is said to be of the first, second, or third kind, according as of the three points—the fulcrum, the point of application of the load, and that of the power—the first, second, or third is between the other two. But this distinction is insignificant; and when these three points are the vertices of a triangle, and the lever is not in the form of a bar, which often happens, the distinction becomes confused. Among the innumerable examples of levers may be mentioned the steelyard, the crowbar, oars, and the bones of the human limbs.

Levers.

F, fulcrum; P, power; W, load or weight. a and b are levers of the first kind, c and d of the second, and e and f of the third. In b, c, and f the pulley is used in combination with the lever. g is a compound lever, or a combination of levers.

A lever to uplift the earth
And roll it in another course.
Tennyson, In Memoriam, cxiii.

2. In special uses—(a) In surg., an instrument for applying power, as one of the arms of an obstetrical forceps, used in delivery as a tractor; the vectis. (b) In dentistry, an instrument used in extracting the stumps of teeth. (c) In a steam-engine, a bar used to control by hand the movement of the engine in starting or reversing it; a starting-bar. (d) In firearms, in some forms of breech-loaders, the piece by which the gun is opened or closed, as in the Douglas, Henry, and Maynard rifles. It may be a top, side, or under lever. E. H. Knight.—3. One of the chief supporters of the roof-timber of a house, being itself not a prop, but a part of the framework. Halliwell.—4. The lower movable board of a barn-door. Halliwell.—5. The first row of a fishing-net.—6. Generally, a rod or bar.

There are certaine fish-shells, like Scalop-shells, found on the shore, so great that two strong men with a leauer can scarce draw one of them after them.
Purchas, Pilgrimage, p. 504.

Arithmetical lever, a straight lever, arranged so that different known weights can be placed at different known distances, either for illustrating the principle of the lever, or for calculating the value of a sum of products of two factors.—Bent lever, a lever having arms bent at an angle, with the fulcrum at the angle.—Bent-lever balance. See tangent-balance.—Catch-lever, a lever which carries a catch, as a part of the valve-gear of an engine.—Compound lever, a machine consisting of several simple levers combined together and acting on each other.—Continual lever, or perpetual lever, a term sometimes applied to the wheel and axle.—Crow's-foot lever, a compound lever used in the middle ages for bending the arbalist and for other purposes.—Goat's-foot lever, a lever formed of two parts, formerly used for bending the hand-bow, arbalist, or crossbow.—Heterodromous lever. See heterodromous.—Lever hand-car, a hand-car which is driven by means of levers attached to cranks.—Live lever. See live[2].—Universal lever, a contrivance by means of which the reciprocating motion of a lever is made to communicate a continuous rotatory motion to a wheel, and a continuous rectilinear motion to anything attached by a rope to the axle of the wheel. (See also floating-lever, hand-lever.) lever[1] (lev'ėr or lē'vėr), v. t. [< lever[1], n.] To act upon, as raising, lowering, etc., with a lever.

One of these locks they picked, and then, by levering up the corner, forced the other three.
R. L. Stevenson, François Villon.

lever[2]†, a. and adv. An obsolete comparative of lief.

leverage (lev'ėr- or lē'vėr-āj), n. [< lever[1] + -age.] 1. The action of a lever; the arrangement by which lever-power is gained.

The fulcrum of the leverage. I. Taylor.

2. Lever-power; the mechanical advantage or power gained by using a lever.

The puny leverage of a hair
The planet's impulse well may spare.
Whittier, The Waiting.

3. Figuratively, advantage for accomplishing a purpose; increased power of action.

A leverage is at once gained [by a certain procedure] for the removal of other obstacles and abuses.
D. A. Wells, Merchant Marine, p. 169.

Such men have the sensibilities that give leverage to the moralist. W. R. Sorley, Ethics of Naturalism, p. 146.

lever-board (lev'ėr-bōrd), n. A corruption of louver-board. See louver-window.

lever-brace (lev'ėr-brās), n. A brace worked by a lever, which has usually a ratchet motion, as in the ratchet-drill.

lever-compressor (lev'ėr-kom-pres'or), n. A device for applying pressure to an object under the microscope. E. H. Knight.

lever-drill (lev'ėr-dril), n. A machine-tool in which the tool-spindle works with a spline in the socket of the wheel which rotates it, and is projected axially by a lever to bring it toward or away from its work. E. H. Knight.

levere†, n. A Middle English form of livery.

lever-engine (lev'ėr-en″jin), n. In steam-engin., a modification of a side-beam engine, in which the beams are levers not of the first but of the second order, the piston-rod connection being at one end of the beams, the fulcrum at the other, and the crank-connection at some intermediate point. In this kind of engine the "throw" of the crank is always less than the stroke of the piston. Also called grasshopper-engine. See cut under grasshopper-beam.

lever-escapement (lev'ėr-es-kāp″ment), n. See escapement, 2.

leveret (lev'ėr-et), n. [< OF. levret (cf. equiv. levreteau, and levrault, F. levraut), a young hare, dim. of levre, F. lièvre = Sp. liebre = Pg. lebre = It. lepre, a hare, < L. lepus (lepor-), a hare: see Lepus. Cf. levrier.] A hare in its first year; a young hare.

leveret-fur (lev'ėr-et-fėr), n. A name given to a Chinese and Japanese ceramic glaze, usually deeply black, flecked with lighter spots, having a fancied resemblance to hare's fur.

lever-faucet (lev'ėr-fâ″set), n. An automatic faucet which closes by a spring and opens by means of a handle or lever. Car-Builder's Dict.

lever-frame (lev'ėr-frām), n. In a railroad hand-car, a wooden frame, shaped somewhat like a letter A, which supports the lever-shaft and lever on the platform. Car-Builder's Dict.

lever-hoist (lev'ėr-hoist), n. A form of lifting-jack employing a lever revolving or reciprocating on a fixed axis. A pair of short arms or stirrups are so attached to the lever that their ends fit into racks set upon both sides, and by catching upon the rack-teeth on alternate sides they enable the lever to raise a weight.

Leverian falcon. See falcon.

lever-jack (lev'ėr-jak), n. A lifting device. It consists of a post, a sliding-rack working in guide-ways formed in or attached to the post and carrying a step which supports the object to be lifted, a pawl pivoted to the post and engaging the sliding-rack to hold the latter from descending, and a lever which is pivoted to the post, and carries a pawl which engages the teeth of the rack and slides it upward, thus raising the weight.

leverock (lev'ėr-ok), n. A variant of laverock, for lark[1].

lever-press (lev'ėr-pres), n. In mach., any press in which power is applied to the "follower" or platen by means of a lever, or a combination of levers, as by a treadle, etc., as distinguished from a pendulum-, screw-, or fly-press. The name is applied more particularly, however, to presses which have only one lever of the second order, generally operated by weights hung upon the end of the lever, but sometimes by a screw used as a substitute for the weights.—Compound lever-press, a press comprising a system of compound levers.—Duplex lever-press, a press having two cam-faced levers drawn together by a screw.

lever-punch (lev'ėr-punch), n. In mach., any punch operated by lever mechanism; in particular, a punch operating upon the principle of the duplex lever-press.

lever-valve (lev'ėr-valv), n. A safety-valve kept down by the pressure of an adjustable weight acting on a lever of the second order. In older locomotives the weight was often replaced by a spring.

leverwood (lev'ėr-wůd), n. The hop-hornbeam or ironwood, Ostrya Virginiana. See Ostrya.

levet† (lev'et), n. [< F. lever, raise, < L. levare: see levant[1].] A musical call or strain intended to arouse or excite; a blast of a trumpet to awaken soldiers in the morning.

Come, sirs, a quaint levet,
To waken our brave general! then to our labor.
Fletcher, Double Marriage, ii. 1.

Waked very early; and when it was time, did call up Will, and we rose, and musique (with a bandore for the base) did give me a levett. Pepys, Diary, I. 335.

levetenant†, n. Same as lieutenant.

levettes†, n. pl. [Early mod. E., appar. irreg. (for the sake of the rime, in this one instance) < leve[1], now leave[1], + -et.] Leavings.

Then gadder they vp their levettis,
Not the best morsels, but gobbettis,
Which vnto pover people they deale.
Roy and Barlow, Rede me and be nott Wroth, p. 80. (Davies.)

leviable (lev'i-a-bl), a. [< levy[1] + -able.] 1. Capable of being levied and collected.

Hence, M. Doniol's would-be purchaser is warned that it never can be worth his while to make improvements on his property, since they would only add to the standard of the fine leviable in these eventualities.
Maine, Early Law and Custom, p. 309.

2. That may be levied upon; capable of being seized upon execution.

leviathan (lē-vī'a-than), n. [= F. léviathan = Sp. leviatán = Pg. leviathan, < LL. leviathan, < Heb. livyāthān, an aquatic animal (see def.); cf. Heb. lāvā, cleave; Ar. lawa, bend, twist.] 1. An aquatic animal mentioned in the Old Testament. It is described in Job xli. apparently as a crocodile; in Isa. xxvii. 1 it is called a piercing and a crooked serpent; and it is mentioned indefinitely in Ps. lxxiv. 14 (as food) and Ps. civ. 26.

Hence, in modern use—2. Any great or monstrous marine animal, as the whale.

Wend we by Sea? the drad Leviathan
Turns vpside-down the boyling Ocean.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, ii., The Furies.

There leviathan,
Hugest of living creatures, on the deep
Stretch'd like a promontory, sleeps or swims.
Milton, P. L., vii. 412.

3. Anything of vast or huge size.

The oak leviathans, whose huge ribs make Their clay creator the vain title take
Of lord of thee [the ocean].
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 181.

Leviathan canvas, coarse canvas used for decorative needlework, the strands being made of two or even three threads each, laid side by side.—Leviathan wool, a soft and loosely laid wool or worsted, used for needlework on leviathan canvas.

levicellular (lev-i-sel'ū-lăr), a. [< L. levis, smooth, + NL. cellula, cell: see cellular.] Pertaining to or consisting of unstriated muscle-fiber.—Levicellular myoma, a myoma composed of smooth muscle-fibers.

levier (lev'i-ėr), n. [< levy[1] + -er[1].] One who levies. Imp. Dict.

levigable (lev'i-gą-bl), a. [< leviga(te)[1] + -ble.] Capable of being rubbed or ground down to fine powder.

levigate[1] (lev'i-gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. levigated, ppr. levigating. [< L. lēvigatus, pp. of lēvigare (> It. levigare = Sp. Pg. levigar = F. léviger), make smooth, < lēvis, erroneously lævis (= Gr. λεῖος, for *λειϝος; cf. equiv. poet. λευρός, for *λεϝρός), smooth, + agere, do, make: see act.] 1. To rub or grind to a fine impalpable powder, as in a mortar. See levigation.

Makes logic levigate the big crime small.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 42.

The massicot [protoxid of lead] . . . is removed, ground, and levigated. . . . The product is minium, or red-lead. Spons' Encyc. Manuf., p. 1550.

2†. To plane; polish; make smooth.

When use hath levigated the organs, and made the way so smooth and easie that the spirits pass without any stop, those objects are no longer felt. Barrow, Works, III. ix.

Levigating-machine, levigating-mill, a mortar having a pestle fitted with a crank and mounted in a frame, for convenience in grinding drugs, paints, etc.

levigate[1] (lev'i-gāt), a. [= It. levigato = Pg. levigado, < L. lēvigatus, pp. of lēvigare, make smooth: see the verb.] Smooth as if polished; having a polished surface: applied in botany to leaves, seeds, etc. Also lævigate.

levigate[2] (lev'i-gāt), v. t.; pret. and pp. levigated, ppr. levigating. [< L. lēvigatus, made light, pp. of lēvigare, make light, < lēvis, light (see levity), + agere, do: see act.] To lighten; make light of; belittle the importance of. [Rare.]

levigate[2] (lev'i-gāt), a. [< L. lēvigatus, pp.: see levigate[2], v.] Lightened; alleviated. [Rare.]

Wherby his labours being levigate, and made more tollerable, he shal gouerne with the better aduyse.
Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, i. 2.

levigation (lev-i-gā'shọn), n. [= F. levigation = Sp. levigación = Pg. levigação = It. levigazione, < L. lēvigatio(n-), a smoothing, < lēvigare, pp. lēvigatus, make smooth: see levigate[1], v.] The act or operation of grinding or rubbing a solid substance to a fine impalpable powder. A mortar and pestle are commonly used in the process, and it is completed by allowing the coarser particles to settle in water, then decanting the latter, letting it stand till the fine powder has fallen to the bottom, and finally pouring off the water. In the chemical analysis of minerals this process is repeated until the mineral has been reduced to a sufficient degree of fineness, the coarser part being subjected to further pulverization after each separation by the aid of the water.

levin[1]†, n. See leven[1].

levin[2]†, n. An obsolete variant of leaven.

levine, n. See levyne.

levipede (lev'i-pēd), a. [< L. lēvis, smooth, + ★pes (ped-), foot.] Smooth-footed.

levirate (lev'i-rāt), n. [= Sp. levirato, < NL. leviratus, < L. levir (= Gr. δαήρ, orig. δαϝήρ, = Skt. dēvara = AS. tācor = OHG. zeihhur), a husband's brother, + -atus, E. -ate[3].] The institution of marriage between a man and the widow of his brother or nearest kinsman under certain circumstances. Among the ancient Hebrews such marriage was required in case the brother died childless, for the purpose of continuing his family the first-born son being the heir of the deceased husband. (Deut. xxv. 5–10; see also Mat. xxii. 24–26.) That institution has been abolished, and the ceremony called chalitza (< chalatz, to loosen) is performed in the synagogue when the widow, according to the Mosaic injunction (Deut. xxv. 9), loosens the shoe from her brother-in-law's foot and spits in his face and exclaims, in Hebrew: "So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house." That performance is binding: without it the widow cannot marry again. A similar custom prevails in parts of India.

leviratic (lev-i-rat'ik), a. [< levirate + -ic.] Pertaining to the levirate.

leviratical (lev-i-rat'i-kal), a. [< leviratic + -al.] Same as leviratic: as, "the first-born son of a leviratical marriage," Dean Alford.

levirate (lev-i-rā'shọn), n. [Irreg. < levirate + -ion.] Leviratic marriage.

Levirostres (lev-i-ros'trēz), n. pl. [NL., < L. lēvis, light, + rostrum, beak.] In ornith.: (a) In Merrem's classification, a group of birds, including the toucans, parrots, and some others, approximately equivalent to the order Psittaci plus the family Rhamphastidæ of modern authors. (b) In Blyth's system (1846), a series or superfamily group of his Picoides, consisting of the toucans, touracous, and colies, or Rhamphastidæ, Musophagidæ, and Coliidæ.

Levisticum (lē-vis'ti-kum), n. [NL. (W. D. J. Koch, 1825): see Ligusticum and lovage.] A genus of umbelliferous plants of the tribe Peucedaneæ and the subtribe Angeliceæ, closely related to Angelica, but having the lateral wings of the fruit thickened. It embraces only a single species, L. Levisticum, the garden lovage. See lovage.

levitate (lev'i-tāt), v.; pret. and pp. levitated, ppr. levitating. [< L. levita(t-)s, lightness (see levity), + -ate[2].] I. trans. To cause to become buoyant in the atmosphere; make light, so as to cause to float in the air; deprive of normal gravity.

II. intrans. To act or move by force of levity —that is, by a repulsive force, contrary to gravity; overcome the force of gravity by means of specific lightness: especially, in recent use, said of a body heavier than the air, but supposed to rise in it by spiritual means.

That distinction between gravitating and levitating matter . . . which the phænomena of their [comets'] tails afford. Herschel, Pop. Lects., p. 140.

It is asserted that a man or a woman levitated to the ceiling, floated about there, and finally sailed out by the window. Huxley, Nineteenth Century, XXI. 201.

levitation (lev-i-tā'shọn), n. [< levitate + -ion.] 1. The act of making light; lightness; buoyancy.

The lungs also of birds, as compared with the lungs of quadrupeds, contain in them a provision distinguishingly calculated for this same purpose of levitation.
Paley, Nat. Theol., xii. § 6.

2. Among Spiritualists, the alleged phenomenon of bodies heavier than air being by spiritual means rendered buoyant in the atmosphere.

The levitation in this case was by the bound Shaman in one lodge being found unbound in the other.
Science, XI. 270.

levitator (lev'i-tā-tọr), n. [< levitat(ion) + -or.] One who believes in the supposed spiritualistic phenomena of levitation, or professes to be able to exhibit them.

Theoretically, therefore, we can have no sort of objection to your miracle. And our reply to the levitators is just the same. Why should not your friend "levitate"?
Huxley, Nineteenth Century, XXI. 202.

Levite (lē'vīt), n. [= F. Lévite = Sp. Pg. It. Levita, < LL. Levites, Levita, < Gr. Λευίτης, a Levite, < Heb. Levi, one of the sons of Jacob.] 1. In Jewish hist., a descendant of Levi, one of the sons of Jacob; one of the tribe of Levi.

I have taken your brethren the Levites from among the children of Israel; to you they are given as a gift for the Lord, to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. Num. xviii. 6.

2. Specifically, one of a body of assistants to the priests in the tabernacle and temple service of the Jews. This body was composed of all males of the tribe of Levi between 30 (or 25) and 50 years of age, exclusive of the family of Aaron, which constituted the priesthood. Originally they guarded the tabernacle, and assisted in carrying it and its vessels, and in preparing the corn, wine, oil, etc., for sacrifice; they furnished the music at the services, and had charge of the sacred treasures and revenues. After the settlement in Palestine they were relieved of some of these duties, but assumed those of religious guides and teachers. Later they were also the learned class, and became scribes, judges, etc. They were allowed no territorial possessions, except thirty-five cities in which they lived, supported by tithes on the produce of the lands of the tribes. The Levites were divided into three families, which bore the names of the sons of Levi—the Gershonites, the Kohathites, and the Merarites.

No Protestant, I suppose, will liken one of our Ministers to a High Priest, but rather to a common Levite.
Milton, Touching Hirelings.

Hence—3. In the early Christian church, a deacon as distinguished from a priest.—4†. A priest; a clergyman: often in slight contempt.

A young Levite—such was the phrase then in use—might be had for his board, a small garret, and ten pounds a year. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., iii.

5†. A fashionable dress for women, introduced about 1780. It was satirized by Horace Walpole as resembling "a man's night-gown bound round with a belt."

Levitic (lē-vit'ik), a. [= F. lévitique = Sp. levítico = Pg. It. levitico, < LL. leviticus, pertaining to the Levites, < Levites, Levita, Levite: see Levite.] Same as Levitical.

Levitical (lē-vit'i-kal), a. [< Levitic + -al.] 1. Of, pertaining to, or peculiar to the Levites. —2. Of, pertaining to, or contained in the book of Leviticus: as, the Levitical law.

By the levitical law, both the man and the woman were stoned to death: so heinous a crime was adultery.
Ayliffe, Parergon.

3. Priestly. [Rare.]

Austin . . . sent to Rome . . . to acquaint the pope of his good success in England, and to be resolved of certain theological, or rather levitical, questions.
Milton, Hist. Eng., iv.

Levitical degrees, degrees of kindred named in Lev. xviii. 6–18, within which persons were prohibited to marry.—Levitical law, that part of the Mosaic law which related to the Levites; hence, that part which regulated the Jewish worship and ritual.

Levitically (lē-vit'i-kal-i), adv. After the manner of the Levites or of the Levitical law.

Leviticus (lē-vit'i-kus), n. [LL., prop. adj., sc. liber, the book of the Levites: see Levitic.] A canonical book of the Old Testament, the third book of Moses or of the Pentateuch, containing principally the laws and regulations relating to the priests and Levites and to religious ceremonies, or the body of the ceremonial law. Abbreviated Lev.

Levitism (lē'vīt-izm), n. [< Levite + -ism.] The doctrines and practices of the Levites.

leviton (lev'i-tọn), n. [ML. levito(n-), a sleeveless robe.] A sleeveless robe worn by Egyptian monks.

levity (lev'i-ti), n. [= OF. levite = Sp. levedad = Pg. levidade = It. levità, < L. lēvita(t-)s, lightness, < lēvis, light, akin to Gr. ἐλαχύς, light, and to E. light[2], q. v.] 1. Lightness of weight; relatively small specific gravity.

Their extreme minuteness and levity enable them [conidia] to be dispersed and carried about by the slightest currents of air. Huxley, Biology, v.

2. A tendency to rise by a force contrary to gravity; specifically, a hypothetical force opposed to gravity: especially near the sun, invoked by some to explain the apparent absence of great pressure at the base of the solar atmosphere. A. M. Clerke, Prob. in Astrophysics, p. 51.

For positive levity, . . . I allow no such thing.
Boyle, Notion of Nature, § 5.

3. Lightness of spirit or temper. Specifically—(a†) Cheerfulness; ease of mind.

To what a blessed levity, . . . to what a cheerful lightness of spirit is he come that comes newly from confession, and with the seal of absolution upon him!
Donne, Sermons, xxiv.

(b) Carelessness of temper or conduct; want of seriousness; disposition to trifle; inconstancy; volatility: as, the levity of youth.

The Censor, frowning upon him, told him that he ought not to discover so much levity in matters of a serious nature. Addison, Trial of Ladies' Quarrels.

=Syn. 3 (b). Levity, Volatility, Flightiness, Frivolity, Lightness. All these words are founded upon the idea of the lack of physical and, by figure, of mental and moral substance or weight, with a resulting ease in flying away from what is wise. The first three refer especially to outward conduct. Levity is a want of seriousness, temporary or habitual, a disposition to trifle with important interests. Volatility is that moral defect by which one cannot dwell long upon any one object of thought, or turns quickly from one source of pleasure to another: the word does not convey much opprobrium; in the young some degree of volatility is expected. Flightiness borders upon the loss of sanity in caprice or excitement of fancy; it is volatility in an extreme degree. Frivolity is a matter of nature, an inability to care about any but the most petty and trifling things. Lightness is not so strong as frivolity, but covers nearly the same ground; it emphasizes inconstancy.

levoglucose, lævoglucose (lē-vọ-glū'kōs), n. [< L. lævus, left, + E. glucose, q. v.] In chem., levorotatory glucose. Also written l-glucose.

levogyrate, lævogyrate (lē-vọ-jī'rāt), a. [< L. lævus, left, + gyratus, pp. of gyrare, turn round in a circle: see gyre, v., gyrate.] Causing to turn toward the left hand: as, a levogyrate crystal—that is, one that turns the rays to the left in the polarization of light. See dextrogyrate.

If the analyser [a slice of quartz] has to be turned towards the right so as to cause the colours to succeed each other in their natural order—red, orange, yellow, green, blue, indigo, violet—the piece of quartz is called right-handed, or dextrogyrate. If, however, the analyser has to be turned from right to left to obtain the natural order of colours, the quartz is called left-handed or levogyrate. Haydn.

levogyrous, lævogyrous (lē-vọ-jī'rus), a. [< L. lævus, left, + gyrus, a turn, gyre: see gyre.] Same as levogyrate.

levulin (lev'ū-lin), n. [As levul(ose) + -in[2].] A carbohydrate ($C_6H_{10}O_5$) occurring in the tubers of certain species of Helianthus.

levulinic (lev-ū-lin'ik), a. [< levulin + -ic.] Derived from levulin.—Levulinic acid, an acid ($C_5H_8O_3$) obtained from levulin, levulose, cane-sugar, cellulose, and other similar substances, by boiling with a dilute mineral acid. It is a crystalline body, soluble in water.

levulose, lævulose (lev'ū-lōs), n. [< L. lævus, left, + -ule + -ose.] A sugar ($C_6H_{12}O_6$) isomeric with d-glucose, but distinguished from it by turning the plane of polarization to the left. It occurs associated with d-glucose in honey, in many fruits, and in other vegetable tissues. The mixture of these two sugars in equal quantities constitutes invert-sugar, which itself turns the plane of polarization to the left, the specific rotatory power of levulose being greater than that of d-glucose. It is usually a thick syrup, having a taste as sweet as that of cane-sugar; it crystallizes with difficulty. Also called fruit-sugar. See fructose.

levy[1] (lev'i), n.; pl. levies (-iz). [Early mod. E. also leavy; < ME. levy, levey, < OF. levee, F. levée, a raising, an embankment (see levee[1]), rising, breaking up, removal, a raising (of troops, of taxes, etc.), = Sp. levada, a rising, attack, = Pg. levada, a current of water, transport, = It. levata, raising, rising, departure, < ML. levata, something raised or levied, tax, exaction, quota, embankment, prop. fem. of L. levatus, pp. of levare, raise: see levant[1].] 1. The act of levying; the raising or collecting of anything by authority or force; compulsory satisfaction of a requirement, claim, or demand: as, to make a levy of troops or taxes.

They have but two ways of raising money publicly in that country [Virginia]: viz., by duties upon trade, and a poll tax, which they call levies. Beverley, Virginia, iv. ¶ 18.

Upon our first, he sent out to suppress
His nephew's levies. Shak., Hamlet, ii. 2. 62.

These are the sons of Christians taken in their childhood from their miserable parents, by a leavy made every five years. Sandys, Travailes, p. 37.

2. Specifically, in law, a sufficient taking of possession of chattels, and assertion of authority, by a sheriff or similar officer, under color of legal process, to render the officer liable for trespass if he be not protected by process: as, a levy upon a debtor's property.

And the constable that doth not his devour for the levey of the same, to lese to the seid comyn tresour, vj. s. viij. d. English Gilds (E. E. T. S.), p. 393.

3. That which is levied, as a body of troops, or the amount accruing from a tax or an execution.

And King Solomon raised a levy out of all Israel, and the levy was thirty thousand men. 1 Ki. v. 13.

The Danes were as superior to their opponents in tactics as in strategy. An encounter between the shire levies and the pirates was a struggle of militia with regular soldiers. J. R. Green, Conq. of Eng., p. 85.

Levy in kind, a tax or toll paid in produce or commodities, in lieu of money.—Levy in mass [F. levée en masse], a levy of all the able-bodied men of a country or district for military service.

levy[1] (lev'i), v.; pret. and pp. levied, ppr. levying. [Formerly also levey (and leave[4], q. v.); < late ME. levyen; < levy, n., in part directly (prop. only in the obs. form leave[4]) < F. lever, raise: see levy[1], n., levant[1].] I. trans. 1†. To raise: as, to levy a siege.

Euphranor, having levied the siege from this one city, forthwith led his army to Demetrius. Holland.

2. To raise or excite; stir up; bring into action; set in motion: as, to levy war.

Never did thought of mine levy offence.
Shak., Pericles, ii. 5. 52.

Yet live in hatred, enmity, and strife
Among themselves, and levy cruel wars.
Milton, P. L., ii. 501.

3. To raise by force or authority; gather or collect by compulsion: as, to levy troops; to levy taxes or tolls; to levy contributions.

And did he not, in his protectorship,
Levy great sums of money through the realm?
Shak., 2 Hen. VI., iii. 1. 61.

If his estate had been confiscated, he wandered about from bawn to bawn and from cabin to cabin, levying small contributions. Macaulay, Hist. Eng., xii.

4. In law: (a) To commence enforcement of, as a legal process, by seizing property thereunder for the purpose of raising means for payment. (b) To erect or construct: as, to levy a mill; to levy a ditch. Imp. Dict.—To levy a fine, at common law, to commence an action on a suit for assuring the title to lands or possessions.

II. intrans. To make a levy.—To levy on, to seize, under color of legal process, for the purpose of raising means for payment.

levy[2]† (lev'i), n. An obsolete form of levee[2].

levy[3] (lev'i), n. [An abbr. of eleven-penny bit.] 1†. A coin, the Spanish real, or eighth part of a dollar (twelve and a half cents), formerly current in the United States. Also called an elevenpenny bit. See fip[2].—2. The sum of twelve and a half cents; a "bit." [Local, U. S. (Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia), in both uses.]

levyne (lev'in), n. [Also levine: so called from Prof. Armand Levy.] A mineral found in Ireland, the Faroe Islands, and some other places. It belongs to the zeolite group, and is a hydrated silicate of calcium and aluminium. It is related to chabazite.

lew[1]†, n. [< ME. lew, lewe, < AS. hleów, shelter, whence in the contr. form hleó, E. lee: see lee[1].] Shelter; a place sheltered from the wind. [Prov. Eng.]

lew[2] (lū), a. [< ME. lew, lewe (= MD. lauw, D. laauw = OHG. lāo (lāw-), MHG. lā (lāw-), G. lau = Icel. hlær, hlýr, warm, mild; orig. with initial h, OHG. hlāo*, whence OF. flo, soft, F. flou, soft, softness), warm, tepid. The asserted derivation from lew[1], n., a shelter, is not obvious. Cf. equiv. lewk, now luke; and cf. also lew-warm.] 1. Warm; lukewarm; tepid. [Prov. Eng.]

Thou art lew [var. in one MS. lewk], nether cold nether hoot. Wyclif, Rev. iii. 16.

2†. Weak; faint. Halliwell.

lew[3]†, n. An obsolete variant of lea[1].

But true it is, to th' end a fruitfull lew
May every Climat in his time renew.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 4.

To love her [Lady Elizabeth Hastings] was a liberal education. Steele, Tatler, No. 49.

Now the perfection of man as an end and the perfection of man as a mean or instrument are not only not the same, they are in reality generally opposed. And as these two perfections are different, so the training requisite for their acquisition is not identical, and has, accordingly, been distinguished by different names. The one is styled liberal, the other professional education—the branches of knowledge cultivated for these purposes being called respectively liberal and professional, or liberal and lucrative, sciences. Sir W. Hamilton, Metaph., i.

The study of them [the classics] is fitly called a liberal education, because it emancipates the mind from every narrow provincialism, whether of egoism or tradition, and is the apprenticeship that every one must serve before becoming a free brother of the guild which passes the torch of life from age to age.
Lowell, Among my Books, 1st ser., p. 177.

2. Free in views or opinions; expansive in purpose or aim; not narrow, bigoted, or intolerant; specifically, favorable to personal, political, or religious liberty; opposed to narrow conservatism or undue restriction: as, a liberal thinker; a liberal Christian; a liberal statesman; the Liberal party (in the politics of some countries).

Quarterly Rev., CLXII. 8.

liberator (lib'e-rā-tor), n. [= F. libérateur = Sp. Pg. liberador = It. liberatore, < L. liberator, one who sets free, < liberare, pp. liberatus, set free: see liberate.] One who liberates or delivers; a deliverer.

He [Luther] was the great reformer and liberator of the European intellect. Buckle, Civilization, II. 534.

liberatory (lib'e-rā-tō-ri), a. [= F. libératoire; as liberate + -ory.] Tending to liberate or set free. [Rare.]

Liberian (lī-bē'ri-an), a. and n. [< Liberia (see def.) (< L. liber, free) + -an.] I. a. Pertaining or relating to Liberia, a country on the western coast of Africa, colonized with liberated Africans by the American Colonization Society (beginning in 1822), and made a republic in 1847.

II. n. An inhabitant of Liberia.

liberomotor (lib'e-rō-mō'tor), a. [Irreg. < L. liberare, free (see liberate), + motor, a mover.] Disengaging or setting free motor energy, as a nervous ganglion: correlated with recipiomotor and dirigomotor. See motor, a.

libertarian (lib-èr-tā'ri-an), a. and n. [< liber(y) + -arian.] I. a. Of or pertaining to liberty, or to the doctrine of the freedom of the will (especially in an extreme form), as opposed to the doctrine of necessity; advocating the doctrine of free will: opposed to necessitarian.

I believe he [Dr. Alex. Crombie, author of an essay on philosophical necessity] may claim the merit of adding the word libertarian to the English language, as Priestley added that of "necessarian." Reid, Correspondence, p. 88.

The "power of acting without a motive," which Reid and other writers, on what used to be called the Libertarian side, have thought it necessary to claim.
H. Sidgwick, Mind, XIII. 407.

II. n. One who maintains the doctrine of the freedom of the will (especially in an extreme form): opposed to necessitarian.

Though Libertarians contend that it is possible for us at any moment to act contrary to our formed character and previous custom, still they and Determinists alike teach that it is much less easy than men commonly imagine to break the subtle unfelt trammels of habit.
H. Sidgwick, Methods of Ethics, p. 49.

libertarianism (lib-èr-tā'ri-an-izm), n. [< libertarian + -ism.] The principles or doctrines of ★the libertarians. H. Sidgwick, Mind, XLI. 144.

liberticide[1] (lib'èr-ti-sīd or li-bèr'ti-sīd), n. [= F. liberticide = Sp. liberticida, < L. liberta(t-)s, liberty, + -cida, < cædere, kill.] A destroyer of liberty.

His country's pride
The priest, the slave, and the liberticide,
Trampled and mocked with many a loathèd rite.
Shelley, Adonais, st. 4.

liberticide[2] (lib'èr-ti-sīd or li-bèr'ti-sīd), n. [< L. liberta(t-)s, liberty, + -cidium, < cædere, kill.] Destruction of liberty.

The principles of Christian morality and Christian philanthropy were violated in the maxims of liberticide which guided the dominant politics of the country.
Whipple, Starr King.

libertinage (lib'èr-tin-āj), n. [< F. libertinage; as libertine + -age.] 1. The character or belief of a libertine or free-thinker; laxity of opinion.

A growing libertinage, which disposed them to think slightly of the Christian faith. Warburton, Works, IX. xiii.

2. The conduct of a libertine or debauchee.

Some fourteen years of squalid youth,
And then libertinage, disease, the grave—
Hell in life here, hereafter life in hell.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 159.

★libertine (lib'èr-tin), n. and a. [= F. libertin = Sp. Pg. It. libertino, < L. libertinus, a freedman, prop. adj., of or belonging to the condition of a freedman, < libertus, a freedman, < liber, free: see liberal, liberate, v. In the later senses (4–7) the word logically depends on liberty, liberal.] I. n. 1. In Rom. hist., a freedman; a person manumitted or set free from legal servitude.

By vertue of an act granted out of the senat, the libertines (i. e. the sonnes of freed-men) were enrolled into the foure tribes of the citie. Holland, tr. of Livy, p. 1210.

2. A member of a Jewish synagogue mentioned in Acts vi. 9, probably composed of descendants of Jewish freedmen who had been expelled from Rome by Tiberius, and had returned to Palestine.

Then there arose certain of the synagogue, which is called the synagogue of the Libertines, . . . disputing with Stephen. Acts vi. 9.

3†. A freeman of an incorporate town or city.

And used me like a fugitive, an inmate of a town,
That is no city libertine, nor capable of their gown.
Chapman, Iliad, xvi.

4. One who is free from or does not submit to restraint; one who is free in thought and action.

When he speaks,
The air, a charter'd libertine, is still.
Shak., Hen. V., i. 1. 48.

And though Rubens in his History is too much a Libertine in this respect, yet there is in this very place, which we now describe, much truth in the habit of his principal Figures, as of King Henry the Fourth, the Queen, her Son, the 3 Daughters, and the Cardinal.
Lister, Journey to Paris, p. 39.

5†. One who holds loose views with regard to the laws of religion or morality; an irreligious person; a free-thinker.

The second sort of those that may be justly number'd among the hinderers of Reformation are Libertines; these suggest that the Discipline sought would be intolerable.
Milton, Reformation in Eng., i.

6. [cap.] A member of a pantheistic, antinomian sect which existed about 1530 in France and neighboring countries. The Libertines maintained that God alone exists, and that there is no distinction between right and wrong, since man, in obeying his own impulses, obeys God, who is in him, and consequently can never commit sin. The sect became grossly sensual, and finally disappeared.

That the Scriptures do not contain in them all things necessary to salvation is the fountain of many great and capital errors: I instance in the whole doctrine of the libertines, familists, quakers, and other enthusiasts, which issue in the corrupted fountain. Jer. Taylor.

7. A man given to the indulgence of lust; one who leads a dissolute, licentious life; a rake; a debauchee.

Like a puff'd and reckless libertine,
Himself the primrose path of dalliance treads.
Shak., Hamlet, i. 3. 49.

Libertines of Geneva, a body of avowed infidels and voluptuaries of the first half of the sixteenth century, who were evidently influenced by the sect mentioned above, if they were not representatives of it.

II. a. 1. Free; unrestrained. [Rare.]

I have rambled in this libertine manner of writing by way of Essay. Steele, Tatler, No. 172.

2. Licentious; dissolute; not under the restraint of or in accord with law or religion: as, libertine principles.

There are men that marry not, but chuse rather a libertine and impure single life than to be yoked in marriage.
Bacon.

Pangs arthritic, that infest the toe
Of libertine excess. Cowper, Task, i. 106.

libertinism (lib'èr-tin-izm), n. [< F. libertinisme; as libertine + -ism.] 1. The exercise of the privileges and rights of a libertine or freedman; exemption from servitude and its disabilities. [Rare.]

Dignified with the title of freeman, and denied the libertinism that belongs to it. Hammond, Works, IV. 486.

2. The state of being free or unrestrained in thought or action.

The genial libertinism of Horace.
Sumner, Orations, I. 143.

3†. Irreligiousness; regardlessness of the dictates of morality.

Ever since hath libertinism of all kinds promoted its interest, and increased its party.
Bp. Atterbury, Sermons, I. iii.

4. The character or conduct of a libertine or rake; licentiousness; unrestrained indulgence of lust; debauchery; lewdness.

libertism† (lib'èr-tizm), n. [< libert(y) + -ism.] Libertinism. [Rare.]

A writ of error, not of libertism, that those two principal leaders of reformation may not now come to be sued in a bill of licence, to the scandal of our Church.
Milton, Judgement of Martin Bucer concerning Divorce.

liberty (lib'èr-ti), n.; pl. liberties (-tiz). [< ME. liberte, libertee, < OF. liberte, F. liberté = Sp. libertad = Pg. liberdade = It. libertà, < L. liberta(t-)s, OL. loeberta(t-)s, freedom, < liber, free: see liberal.] 1. The state of being free, or exempt from external restraint or constraint, physical or moral; freedom; especially, exemption from opposition or irksome restraint of any kind.

The creature itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God. Rom. viii. 21.

Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free. Gal. v. 1.

I must have liberty
Withal, as large a charter as the wind,
To blow on whom I please.
Shak., As you Like it, ii. 7. 47.

The natural liberty of man is to be free from any superior power on earth, and not to be under the will or legislative authority of man, but to have only the law of Nature for his rule. Locke, Of Government, II. iv. 22.

'Tis liberty alone that gives the flower
Of fleeting life its lustre and perfume.
Cowper, Task, v. 446.

The French notion of liberty is political equality; the English notion is personal independence.
W. R. Greg, Misc. Essays, 2d ser., p. 89.

Specifically—2. Freedom of the will; the power of election or free choice, undetermined by any necessity; exemption from internal compulsion or restraint in willing or volition.

Liberty . . . is the power a man has to do or forbear doing any particular action, according as its doing or forbearance has the actual preference in the mind.
Locke, Human Understanding, II. xxi. 15.

Freedom from necessity is also called liberty of election, or power to choose, and implies freedom from anything invincibly determining a moral agent. It has been distinguished into liberty of contrariety, or the power of determining to do either of two actions which are contrary, as right or wrong, good or evil; and liberty of contradiction, or the power of determining to do either of two actions which are contradictory, as to walk or to sit still, to walk in one direction or in another. Freedom from necessity is sometimes also called liberty of indifference, because, before he makes his election, the agent has not determined in favor of one action more than of another.
Fleming, Vocab. Philos.

3. The condition of being exempt, as a community or an individual, from foreign or arbitrary political control; a condition of political self-government. Civil liberty implies the subjection of the individual members of a community to laws imposed by the community as a whole; but it does not imply the assent of each individual to these laws. An individual has civil liberty if he is a member of a community which possesses such liberty, and is in the enjoyment of the rights which the laws of the community guarantee him.

If not equal all, yet free,
Equally free; for orders and degrees
Jar not with liberty. Milton, P. L., v. 793.

Real liberty is neither found in despotism, nor in the extremes of democracy, but in moderate governments.
A. Hamilton, Works, II. 416.

Liberty and Union, now and forever, one and inseparable.
D. Webster, Second Speech on Foote's Resolution.

4. In law, freedom from all restraints except such as the lawful rights of others prescribe.— 5. Permission granted, as by a superior, to do something that one might not otherwise do; leave; specifically, permission granted to enlisted men in the navy to go on shore. Compare liberty-man.

There is full liberty of feasting, from this present hour of five till bell have told eleven. Shak., Othello, ii. 2. 10.

There is no liberty for causes to operate in a loose and straggling way. Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici, i. 18.

6. Immunity enjoyed by prescription or by grant; privilege; exemption; franchise: as, the liberties of the commercial cities of Europe.

It is the property of Englishmen, much more of religious Englishmen, and should be most of all of religious New Englishmen, to be tenacious and tender of their liberties.
U. Oakes, Election Sermon (Tyler's Amer. Lit., II. 106).

7. A place or district within which certain special privileges may be exercised; the limits within which freedom is enjoyed by those entitled to it; a place of exclusive jurisdiction: generally in the plural: as, the liberties of a prison (the limits within which prisoners are free to move); within the city liberty; the Northern Liberties (a part of Philadelphia so named because originally consisting of districts having certain specific privileges).

We had told him that, if ours [our vessels] did trade within his liberties, they should do it at their own peril.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 377.

Yet there are no people in the Liberty of Westminster that live in more credit than we do.
Foote, The Commissary, i.

We dropt with evening on a rustic town
Set in a gleaming river's crescent-curve,
Close at the boundary of the liberties.
Tennyson, Princess, i.

8. Action or speech not warranted by custom or propriety; freedom not specially granted; freedom of action or speech beyond the ordinary bounds of civility or decorum: as, may I take the liberty of calling on you?

This headstrong writer came; who, with a new-found art,
Made following authors take less liberty.
Dryden and Soame, tr. of Horace's Art of Poetry, i. 130.

This Liberty of your Tongue will one Day bring a Confinement on your Body. Congreve, Love for Love, i. 3.

Acres. I never saw him in my life.
Sir Luc. That's no argument at all — he has the less right then to take such a liberty. Sheridan, The Rivals, iii. 4.

He was repeatedly provoked into striking those who had taken liberties with him. Macaulay.

9. In the manège, a curve or arch in a horse's bit affording room for the tongue. — At liberty. (a) Free from constraint; free: as, to set a person at liberty.

And yet within these five hours lived Lord Hastings, Untainted, unexamined, free, at liberty.
Shak., Rich. III., iii. 6. 9.

(b) With freedom or power (to do something): as, he was not at liberty to disclose the secret.

I took one of the janizaries of the place, and paid him the usual Tribute, and found myself at perfect liberty to do what I pleased. Pococke, Description of the East, I. 9.

(c) Disengaged; not in use.

I dressed as well as I could for shivering, and washed when there was a basin at liberty.
Charlotte Brontë, Jane Eyre, v.

Cap of Liberty. See cap[1] and liberty-cap. — Civil liberty. See civil, and def. 3, above. — Forest liberties, Gallican liberties, jail liberties. See the qualifying words. — Liberties' Union Act, an English statute of 1850 (13 and 14 Vict., c. 105), providing for the incorporation of liberties with the counties in which they are situated. — Liberty hall. See hall. — Liberty of indifference. See quotation from Fleming under def. 1, and indifference. — Liberty of the press, freedom of the press from police restrictions of the right to print and publish; liberty to print and publish without previous permission from government. Liberty of the press is deemed to exist where the only restrictions on the right of publishing are amenability to judicial process for damages, or to punishment, after making an actionable or criminal publication, and amenability to judicial process to prevent intended publication on proof that it is injurious to rights of private property. — Liberty party, in U. S. hist., a political party whose leading principle was the abolition of slavery. It arose about 1839, and nominated a candidate for President in 1840 and in 1844. From 1848 its members generally acted with the Free-soil and later with the Republican party. — Natural liberty, the power of acting as one thinks fit, without any restraint or control, unless by the law of nature. Blackstone. [Many writers, however, use natural liberty in the sense ascribed to civil liberty.] — Personal liberty, freedom from restraint of the person. — Political liberty, freedom from political usurpation; the condition of a people which participates in the making of its own laws, in a state which is not subject to foreign domination. — Religious liberty, the right of freely adopting and professing opinions on religious subjects, and of worshiping or refraining from worship according to the dictates of conscience, without external control. — To break liberty. See break. = Syn. Independence, etc. (see freedom); License, etc. (see leave[2], n.).

liberty-book (lib'ėr-ti-bůk), n. A book on a man-of-war which shows the length of liberty allowed, the time of returning, and the condition in which the man returned. Luce.

liberty-cap (lib'ėr-ti-kap), n. A cap of the form known as the Phrygian, used as a symbol of political or personal liberty. The custom is taken from the supposed use of this cap as a token of the manumission of a slave in Rome. The red cap of the French extreme revolutionists (see bonnet-rouge) was identified with the Roman cap of liberty, which accordingly became the symbol of the French revolution.

liberty-man (lib'ėr-ti-man), n. Naut., a sailor who has leave to go ashore; one who has been allowed a period of liberty for recreation.

It is a point with liberty-men to be pulled off and back by their shipmates.
R. H. Dana, Jr., Before the Mast, p. 147.

liberty-pole (lib'ėr-ti-pōl), n. A tall flagstaff set up in honor of liberty, usually surmounted with the liberty-cap or other symbol of liberty. [U. S.]

The soldiers openly insulted the people, and in a few weeks cut down their liberty-pole.
Preble, Hist. of the Flag, p. 193.

libethenite (li-beth'en-īt), n. [< Libethen (see def.) + -ite[2].] The basic phosphate of copper, a mineral first found at Libethen in Hungary, having an olive-green color and crystallizing in the orthorhombic system. It is isomorphous with olivenite.

libidinist (li-bid'i-nist), n. [< L. libido (libidin-), desire (see libidinous), + -ist.] One who is given to lewdness. [Rare.]

Nero, being monstrous incontinent himself, verily believed that all men were most foul libidinists.
F. Junius, Sin Stigmatized (1639), p. 350.

libidinosity (li-bid-i-nos'i-ti), n. [< F. libidinosité; as libidinous + -ity.] The state or character of being libidinous; libidinousness.

libidinous (li-bid'i-nus), a. [< F. libidineux = Sp. Pg. It. libidinoso, < L. libidinosus, lubidinosus, full of desire, passion, or appetite, lascivious, < libido, lubido (libidin-, lubidin-), desire, < libet, lubet, it pleases: see liberal.] Characterized by lust or lewdness; having or arising from an eager appetite for sexual indulgence; lustful; lewd; also, fitted to excite lustful desire.

It is not love, but strong libidinous will,
That triumphs o'er me.
Beau. and Fl., Knight of Malta, i. 1.

= Syn. Prurient, concupiscent. See list under lascivious.

libidinously (li-bid'i-nus-li), adv. In a libidinous manner; with lewd desire; lustfully; lewdly.

libidinousness (li-bid'i-nus-nes), n. The state or quality of being libidinous; lustfulness; lewdness.

libken†, libkin†, n. [Appar. < live[1] (lib*) + ken[5].] A house; lodgings. [Old slang.]

To their libkins at the crackman's.
B. Jonson, Gipsies Metamorphosed.

These are the fees that I always charge a swell that must have his lib-ken to himself — thirty shillings a-week for lodgings, and a guinea for garnish; half-a-guinea a-week for a single bed. Scott, Guy Mannering, xliv.

liblong†, n. An obsolete form of livelong[2]. Cotgrave.

Libocedrus (lī-bō-sē'drus), n. [NL. (Endlicher, 1847); the first element is not obvious; the second is Gr. κέδρος, the cedar: see cedar.] A genus of coniferous trees of the tribe Cupressineæ. It is closely related to Thuja, the arbor-vitæ, but distinguished from it by having only two fertile scales in the cone, and seeds united at the top. There are eight species, natives of Chili, California, China, Japan, New Zealand, and New Caledonia. L. decurrens, the North American species, called white cedar, bastard cedar, post-cedar, and incense-cedar, is a large tree, sometimes 150 feet in height, ranging from Oregon to Mexico, with light, soft, durable wood. (See incense-cedar.) L. Chilensis is the Chilian ★arbor-vitæ or alerce-tree.

libra (lī'brą), n. [< L. libra, a balance, a Roman pound (see livre); cf. Gr. λίτρα, a pound (see liter). Hence ult. livre, libella, level[1], etc.] 1. [cap.] An ancient zodiacal constellation, representing an ordinary pair of scales. This constellation was not commonly used among the Greeks, its place being occupied by the Chelæ, or Scorpion's Claws. It is found, however, in all the Egyptian zodiacs, going back to 600 B. C.; but there is reason to believe that it is not as old as the rest of the zodiac (that is, 2,000 years or more B. C.). Its principal stars, Kiffa borealis and Kiffa australis, 2.7 and 3.0 magnitude respectively, are at the base of an isosceles triangle of which Antares forms the vertex.

2. [cap.] The seventh sign of the zodiac, represented by the character ♎, which shows the scale-beam. — 3. An Italian or Spanish pound. The Roman pound was 327 grams or 5,046 grains troy, and the Italian light-weight pounds seem to be derived from it, their heavy weights having another origin, as is shown in the following table:

Libra.	Grains.	Libra.	Grains.
Grossa of Milan	11,776.7	Rome	5,234.0
Piccola of Milan	5,046.6	Messina	4,923.7
Naples	4,949.1	Tuscany	5,240.5
Piedmont	5,692.6	Grossa of Venice	7,363.0
Ragusa	5,772.7	Sottile of Venice	4,649.5

All these statements are taken from the work of the Russian Commission. The Castilian libra was 7,101 grains; that of Portugal was 7,083.3 grains. The libra of Spain, Mexico, etc., is 1.014 pounds avoirdupois.

libral (lī'brąl), a. [< L. libralis, of a pound weight, < libra, a pound: see libra.] Of or pertaining to a Roman libra or pound: as, the libral as, a Roman bronze coin weighing one pound or 12 ounces (compare as[4]); the libral system, the Roman monetary system based on the libra or pound.

librarian (lī-brā'ri-ąn), n. [In def. 1, < L. librarius, a transcriber of books, also a bookseller (> It. librajo = Sp. librero = Pg. livreiro, a bookseller, = OF. libraire, a bookseller, transcriber, a writer of books, F. libraire, a bookseller), < librarius, belonging to books: see library. In def. 2 as if directly < library + -an.] 1†. One who transcribes or copies books.

Charybdis thrice swallows, and thrice refunds, the waves: this must be understood of regular tides. There are indeed but two tides in a day, but this is the error of the librarian. Broome, Notes on the Odyssey.

2. The keeper or custodian of a library; one who has charge of the books and other contents of a library.

librarianship (lī-brā'ri-ąn-ship), n. [< librarian + -ship.] 1. The office of librarian. — 2. The work of a librarian; the management of a library.

A very good basis for his modest plea for the recognition of librarianship as one of the learned professions.
★ Science, VIII. 70.

library (lī'brą-ri), n.; pl. libraries (-riz). [< ME. librarie, < OF. librairie, librarie, libraire, a bookseller's shop, a bookcase, a library, F. librairie = Pr. librari = Sp. librería (after F.) = Pg. livraria = It. libreria (after F.), a bookseller's shop, bookselling, also, in imprints, a publication-office, < L. libraria, a bookseller's shop, ML. a library, cf. L. librarium, a bookcase, fem. and neut. respectively of librarius, belonging to books, < liber, a book: see liber[1]. For the Rom. word for 'library' in the usual E. sense, see bibliotheca.] 1. A place set apart for the keeping and use of books and other literary material; a room, set of rooms, or a building in which a collection of books for reading or study is kept.

His library (where busts of poets dead
And a true Pindar stood without a head)
Received of wits an undistinguished race.
Pope, Prol. to Satires, l. 235.

2. A collection of books, whether manuscript or printed, which may include also pamphlets, maps, and other literary material, intended for reading, study, or reference, as distinguished from a bookseller's stock, which is intended for sale. Libraries are of different kinds and classes according to the tastes of their owners, the readers for whom they are designed, their contents, and the manner in which they may be used, as private, public, special or professional, general, consulting or circulating, etc.

Knowing I loved my books, he furnish'd me
From mine own library with volumes that I prize above my dukedom.
Shak., Tempest, i. 2. 167.

Alexandrian library, a library at Alexandria (see Alexandrian), destroyed about 47 B. C. A supplementary or second library was in the Serapeum. This library (according to some writers who discredit its sacking by the Arabs) was entirely destroyed under Theophilus, A. D. 391. — Ambrosian, Cottonian, Laurentian, etc., library. See the adjectives. — Circulating library. (a) A library the books of which circulate among the users: distinguished from a consulting or reference library, where books may be consulted, but from which they may not be taken away. (b) Specifically, a collection or stock of books kept exclusively for lending out, as a private enterprise, either for a fixed payment on each or for a periodical subscription.

library-keeper (lī'brą-ri-kē"pėr), n. The custodian of a library: formerly used for the now current librarian, 2.

librate[1] (lī'brāt), v.; pret. and pp. librated, ppr. librating. [< L. libratus, pp. of librare, poise, weigh, balance, < libra, a balance: see libra.] I. trans. To hold in equipoise; poise; balance.

II. intrans. To move as a balance; be poised.

The birds of the air librating over me served as a canopy from the rays of the sun. Beckford, Vathek, p. 193.

librate[2] (lī'brāt), n. [< ML. librata, the value of a pound (librata terræ, appar. orig. a piece of land producing an annual rent of one pound), < L. libra, a pound: see libra.] 1. Land of the annual value of one pound. — 2. A piece of land containing 4 oxgangs of 13 acres each. Minsheu; Bailey.

The sheriffs were ordered to send [to a provincial council] all persons who possessed more than twenty librates of land. Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 179.

libration (lī-brā'shọn), n. [< F. libration = Sp. libración = Pg. libração = It. librazione, < L. librātio(n-), a poising, < librare, pp. libratus, poise: see librate[1].] 1. The act of librating or balancing, or the state of being balanced; a state of equipoise; balance. — 2. In astron., a real or apparent libratory or oscillating motion, like that of a balance before coming to rest. — Libration of the earth, a phrase used by some of the older astronomers to describe that feature of the earth's motion by which, while it revolves in its orbit, its axis constantly continues parallel to itself. — Libration of the moon, an apparent irregularity of the moon's rotation, whereby those parts very near the border of the lunar disk alternately become visible and invisible, indicating, as it were, a sort of vibratory motion of the lunar globe. The libration of the moon is of four kinds: (a) libration in longitude, or a seeming vibratory motion according to the order of the signs, due to the fact that the angular motion of the moon in her orbit is not precisely uniform, as her rotation about her axis is; (b) libration in latitude, in consequence of her axis being inclined to the plane of her orbit, so that sometimes one of her poles and sometimes the other declines, as it were, or dips toward the earth; (c) diurnal libration, apparent only, and due to the earth's rotation. When the moon is rising we overlook its upper (western) limb, and the eastern when setting. If the earth were very small this libration would disappear; (d) physical libration, an extremely small (but certain) actual oscillation unexplained by the causes above named, and probably due to imperfect sphericity of the moon,—a slight elongation of the diameter which is always nearly directed toward the earth, forming a "bulge" upon which the earth's attraction acts.

libratory (lī'brā-tō-ri), a. [< librate[1] + -ory.] Balancing; moving like a balance as it tends to become stationary; oscillating.

Astronomers . . . ascribe to the moon a libratory motion, or motion of trepidation, which they pretend is from east to west, and from north to south.
Dict. of Trevoux. (Latham.)

librettist (li-bret'ist), n. [< libretto + -ist.] A writer of librettos; one who writes the words for an extended musical composition.

Cambert . . . built his work on the Florentine model, and, encouraged by success, wrote several others, on the strength of which he, with his librettist Perrin, instituted the Académie Royale de Musique. Encyc. Brit., XVII. 87.

libretto (li-bret'ō), n. [It., dim. of libro, a book, < L. liber, a book: see liber[1].] 1. A book containing the words of an extended musical composition, like an opera or an oratorio.—2. The words themselves of such a work; the text.

libriform (lī'bri-fôrm), a. [< L. liber, inner bark, + forma, form.] Having the form of liber or bast.—Libriform cells or fibers, those wood-cells which resemble liber in being extremely thick-walled.

The wood of the beech consists of the usual elements—vessels, tracheides, libriform fibres, and wood parenchyma. Nature, XXXIX. 511.

librilla (lī-bril'ä), n. [ML., a balance (steelyard), a warlike engine, dim. of L. libra, a balance: see libra.] A fool's bauble.

libs (libz), n. [L., < Gr. Λίψ, the southwest wind, perhaps, like λίψ (λιβ-), any liquid poured forth, a drop, stream, < λείβειν, pour (so called because it brought wet).] The west-southwest wind. Shenstone.

Liburnian (lī-bėr'ni-an), a. and n. [< L. Liburnia, Gr. Λιβυρνία, Λιβουρνία, the country so called, Liburni, Gr. Λιβυρνοί, Λιβύρνιοι, the inhabitants, an Illyrian people.] I. a. In anc. geog., pertaining or relating to the country called Liburnia, on the eastern coast of the Adriatic sea, southeast of Istria, answering to parts of modern Fiume, Croatia, and northern Dalmatia.—Liburnian galley, a light, fast-sailing ship with two or more banks of oars, originally used by Liburnian pirates, and employed by the Romans at the battle of Actium and afterward as a war-ship.

II. n. In anc. hist., an inhabitant of Liburnia. Liburnians were much employed at Rome under the empire as porters and litter-bearers.

Libyan (lib'i-an), a. and n. [< L. Libya, < Gr. Λιβύη, the northern part of Africa, west of Egypt; cf. L. Libs, Libys, < Gr. Λίβυς, a Libyan.] I. a. 1. Of or pertaining to Libya. Libya was the ancient Greek name of that part of northern Africa which lies between Egypt and the Atlantic, but especially of the country immediately west of Egypt. The term was also used by the Greeks as the name of the whole continent of Africa.
2. Belonging to or concerning a branch of the Hamitic family of languages found in and about ancient Libya. Also called Berber.—Libyan subregion, in zoögeog. See region.

II. n. A member of the primitive race inhabiting ancient Libya; a Berber.

Licania (lī-kā'ni-ä), n. [NL. (Fusée Aublet, 1775); said to be a modification of caligni, the native name of these trees in Guiana.] A genus of rosaceous plants of the tribe Chrysobalaneæ, distinguished by the small anthers, minute stamens, and one-celled ovary. There are about 60 species, trees or shrubs, natives of tropical America, with alternate simple leaves and small flowers. The wood is exceedingly hard. L. heteromorpha is called Cayenne rose and Cayenne sassafras, pepperwood, and pottery-bark tree, names indicating its character and uses.

licca-tree (lik'ä-trē), n. A West Indian shrub or tree, Fagara spinosa. Also called lignum-rorum.

lice, n. Plural of louse[1].

licebane (līs'bān), n. The stavesacre, Delphinium Staphisagria, a species of larkspur.

licensable (lī'sen-sa-bl), a. [< license + -able.] Capable of being licensed; suitable to be licensed; permitted by legal grant.

license, licence (lī'sens), n. [< ME. licence, < OF. (and F.) licence = Sp. licencia = Pg. licença = It. licenza, < L. licentia, license, < licen(t-)s, ppr. of licere, be allowed, be allowable; cf. linquere, Gr. λείπειν, leave: see delinquent, relinquish. Hence also (from L. licere) E. leisure, licit, illicit, licentiate, etc.] 1. Authority or liberty to do or forbear some act; the admission of an individual, by proper authority, to the right of doing particular acts, practising a certain profession, or conducting a certain trade; a grant of authorization; a permit.

I will no lenger dwelle in this contre,
Wherefore, I you beseche, sithe it is so,
That ye will graunte me licence for to go.

A license
Which did not more embolden than encourage My faulting tongue. Ford, Perkin Warbeck, i. 2.

Very few of the Egyptians avail themselves of the licence, which their religion allows them, of having four wives. E. W. Lane, Modern Egyptians, I. 162.

Specifically—(a) In the law of real property, authority to do an act or series of acts upon the land of the person granting the license, without, however, conferring on the licensee any estate in the land: as, a license to enter and shore up an adjoining building, or to take sand, or bore for oil: distinguished from easement. (b) In patent and copyright law, permission to use the invention patented, or publish the work copyrighted, without a grant of any proprietary rights therein. (c) In the law of municipal corporations and police power, permission from government to pursue a vocation or carry on acts which are prohibited to those not taking a license, the object being, by the prohibition and the conditions imposed on the permission, to regulate the extent or manner of doing what is licensed. (d) In international law, a safe-conduct granted by a belligerent state to its own subjects, to those of its enemy, or to neutrals, to carry on a trade which is interdicted by the laws of war, and operating as a dispensation from the penalties of those laws, with respect to the state granting it. Halleck. (e) Eccles., an authority to preach, but not to administer the sacraments, nor to represent the church as a clergyman in its ecclesiastical assemblies, which powers are conferred by ordination. The license is granted, frequently for a limited period only, by an ecclesiastical body, after examination of the candidate as to his fitness. The person licensed is termed a licentiate. In the Anglican Church, a deacon must procure a license from a bishop to enable him to preach, that power not being inherent in his office. A license from the bishop is also necessary to permit a man not in orders to act as lay reader.

2. A document or certificate conferring such authority or permission.—3. Unrestrained freedom of thought and action, especially the abuse of such freedom; excess of liberty; undue freedom; freedom misused in contempt of law and decorum; rejection of legal and moral control; libertinism.

License they mean when they cry liberty.
Milton, Sonnets, vii.

We have already all the liberty which freeborn subjects can enjoy; and all beyond it is but licence.
Dryden, All for Love, Ded.

No more let Ribaldry with Licence writ
Usurp the Name of Eloquence or Wit.
Steele, Conscious Lovers, Prol.

4. An intentional departure from a rule or standard in art or literature; exceptional liberty taken for the sake of a particular purpose or effect: as, poetical or musical license; to use license in painting or sculpture.

Public transactions had generally been recorded in verse. The first historians might, therefore, indulge without fear of censure in the license allowed to their predecessors the bards. Macaulay, History.

High license, a license for the sale of liquor granted only at what is regarded as a high rate, and intended thereby to reduce the number and improve the character of the places so licensed. The principle of high license is regarded as an efficient agency for the promotion of temperance.—Letter of license, an agreement between an embarrassed debtor and his creditors, that the latter shall for a time forbear to enforce their claims, and allow him meanwhile to carry on the business without molestation. The usual form in the United States is a "composition deed," by which the creditors commonly agree to receive part as payment in full, or to receive notes payable at future periods. A letter of license containing provisions that the business is to be carried on under the inspection and control of a committee of the creditors is called a deed of inspectorship.—License cases, the decision by the United States Supreme Court in three cases, in 1847 (5 How., 504), sustaining State laws requiring licenses to sell spirituous liquors, on the ground that the constitutional provision conferring on Congress the power to regulate commerce among the States does not restrict the power of a State to legislate on matters of police, public health, etc.—License in amortization, a license to convey lands to a corporation whose holding of lands was otherwise forbidden by the law of mortmain, because it involved a perpetuity.—Marriage license. See marriage.—Registrar's license, in Eng. law, a license issued by a superintendent registrar for a marriage without religious ceremony at the registrar's office or with religious ceremony in a dissenting chapel or in a church or chapel of the Church of England, but in the latter case only by a clergyman of that church and with consent of the minister.—Rod license, a license-tax paid by anglers for the privilege of fishing for salmon. [Canada.]—Special license, specifically, in Eng. law, a license obtained from the Archbishop of Canterbury, permitting specified persons to be married without publication of banns and at a time or place other than those prescribed by law.—Syn. 3. Liberty, etc. (see leave[2], n.); laxity.

license (lī'sens), v. t.; pret. and pp. licensed, ppr. licensing. [< F. licencier = Pr. Sp. licenciar = Pg. licencear = It. licenziare, < ML. licentiare, license, < L. licentia, license: see license, n. Cf. licentiate[1], v.] 1. To grant authority to do an act which, without such authority, would be illegal or inadmissible; remove restrictions from by a grant of permission; authorize to act in a particular character: as, to license a man to keep an inn; to license a physician or a lawyer. Also licence.

In this Year Proclamation was made, whereby the People were licensed to eat white Meats in Lent.
Baker, Chronicles, p. 291.

The king's right of licencing, and of assenting or withholding assent to the election, was backed up by his power of influencing the opinion of the electors.
Stubbs, Const. Hist., § 381.

2. Generally, to permit to act without restraint; allow; tolerate; privilege: as, a licensed buffoon.

Jests like a licens'd fool, commands like law.
Donne, Satires, iv. 228.

From stage to stage the licensed earl may run.
Pope, Dunciad, iv. 587.

3†. To permit an action of; grant liberty to for a particular proceeding.

I pray, Sir, licence me a question.
Chapman, May-Day, i. 1.

Licence my innocent flames, and give me leave to love such charming sweetness. Steele, Lying Lover, i. 1.

4†. To dismiss. [Rare.]

He would play well, and willingly, at some games of greatest attention, which shewed, that when he listed he could license his thoughts. Sir H. Wotton.

Licensed victualler. See victualler.—Power to license, conferred on a municipality, is generally understood to mean power to regulate by prescribing the conditions on compliance with which the thing shall be permitted, but not to imply the power absolutely to prohibit any useful business.

licensee (lī-sen-sē'), n. [< license + -ee[1].] One to whom a license is granted. Also licencee.

licenser (lī'sen-sėr), n. 1. One who licenses or grants permission; a person authorized to grant permission to others: as, a licenser of the press. Also licencer. In legal use often licensor.—2†. Same as censor, 2.

license-tax (lī'sens-taks), n. In the statutes of Wisconsin, an annual license-fee imposed on certain corporations, computed by a percentage of gross receipts, and taken in lieu of ordinary taxation.

The license-tax, as it is called there [in Wisconsin], applies to railroads, insurance, telegraph, and telephone companies. Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 464.

licensure (lī'sen-sūr), n. [< license + -ure.] The granting of a license; the act of licensing, as of an unordained preacher in a church of the Presbyterian order. See licentiate[1], n., 1 (b).

licentiate[1]† (lī-sen'shi-āt), v. t. [ME. licenciat, pp.; < ML. licentiatus, pp. of licentiare, license: see license, v.] To give license or permission to; encourage by license.

All thingis be takin treuly as thai attest, ay liscenciat and lovit with al ledis.
Booke of Precedence (E. E. T. S., extra ser.), i. 101.

We may not hazard either the stifling of generous inclinations or the licentiating of anything that is coarse.
Sir R. L'Estrange.

licentiate[1] (lī-sen'shi-āt), n. [< ME. licenciat = F. licencié = Pg. licenceado = Sp. licenciado = It. licenziato, < ML. licentiatus, pp. of licentiare, license: see licentiate, v.] 1. One who has license to practice an art or a profession.

The College of Physicians, in July, 1687, published an edict requiring all fellows, candidates, and licentiates to give gratuitous advice to the neighbouring poor.
Johnson, Garth.

The licentiate Don Felix del Rey, a practising advocate before the royal courts of St. Domingo and Mexico.
Gayarré, Hist. Louisiana, II. 334.

Specifically—(a) A friar licensed by the Pope to hear confession, grant absolution, and inflict penance in any place independently of the local clergy.

He hadde power of confessioun,
As seyde himself, more than a curat,
For of his ordre he was licentiat.
Chaucer, Gen. Prol. to C. T., l. 220.

(b) In non-episcopal churches, as the Presbyterian, a person licensed to preach and perform the ordinary services of public worship, prior to being ordained as a pastor.

2†. One who behaves in a licentious manner; one who transcends the bounds of due restraint and decorum. [Rare.]

What is this but to baffle and affront that sacred power, which is entrusted to government, and to profess ourselves not libertines, but licentiates of disorder?
Bp. Hall, Sermon, Christian Liberty.

licentiate[2] (lī-sen'shi-āt), n. [< ML. licentiatus, the condition of having a license, LL. freedom, license, < L. licentia, license: see license, n., and -ate[3].] The condition of having a license; specifically, in continental Europe, an academical dignity which intervenes between the baccalaureate and the doctorate, and is a step toward the doctor's degree.

licentiateship (lī-sen'shi-āt-ship), n. [< licentiate[1], n., + -ship.] The condition or office of a licentiate.

licentiation (lī-sen-shi-ā'shon), n. [< ML. licentiatio(n-)*, < licentiare, license: see license, v.]

The act of licensing or permitting; the granting of a license or of licenses.

There is a tacit licentiation or permitting of error.
Freeman, Sermons (1643), p. 35. (Latham.)

The system of medical licentiation is year by year becoming more stringent and more centralized.
Encyc. Brit., XI. 19.

licentious (lī-sen'shus), a. [< F. licencieux = Sp. Pg. licencioso = It. lizenzioso, < L. licentiosus, full of license, unrestrained, < licentia, license: see license, n.] 1. Characterized by or using license; marked by or indulging too great freedom; overpassing due bounds or limits; excessive. [Now rare.]

, For since the cheife grace of our vulgar Poesie consisteth in the Symphonie, as hath bene already sayd, our maker must not be too licentious in his concords.
Puttenham, Arte of Eng. Poesie, p. 67.

The Throats and Lungs of Hawkers, with voices more licentious than the loud Flounder-man's.
Congreve, Way of the World, v. 5.

He is a very licentious translator, and does not recompense his neglect of the author by beauties of his own.
Johnson, Stepney.

Specifically—2. Unrestrained by law, religion, or morality; wanton; loose; dissolute; libidinous: as, a licentious person; licentious desires.

How dearly would it touch thee to the quick,
Shouldst thou but hear I were licentious!
Shak., C. of E., ii. 2. 133.

Divinity itself, inculcating an abject reverence for the Court, gave additional effect to the licentious example of the Court. Macaulay, Hallam's Const. Hist.

=Syn. 2. Profligate, dissolute, debauched. See list under lascivious.

licentiously (lī-sen'shus-li), adv. In a licentious manner; with too great freedom; especially, in contempt of law and morality; lasciviously; loosely; dissolutely.

licentiousness (lī-sen'shus-nes), n. The state or character of being licentious; want of due restraint in any respect; especially, dissolute or profligate conduct; sexual immorality.

licet (lī'set), n. [< L. licet, it is permitted: see license.] A formal certificate of permission; authorization.

No faculty or investigator must be allowed to poach beyond the lines laid down by the great Kantean survey, even for an hypothesis or conjecture. It is the function of the philosopher to enforce the licet and non-licet of the code. Amer. Jour. Psychol., I. 152.

lich[1]†, n. An assibilated form of like[1].

lich[2]†, a. An obsolete assibilated form of like[2].

-lich[1]†, -liche[1]†. Middle English forms of -ly[1].

-lich[2]†, -liche[2]†. Middle English forms of -ly[2].

lichanos (lik'a-nos), n. [Gr. λίχανος (sc. χορδή, string), the string struck with the forefinger, and its note, prop. the forefinger, lit. (sc. δάκτυλος, finger) the licking finger, < λείχειν, lick: see lick, v.] In anc. Gr. music, originally, the forefinger-string of the lyre, and the tone produced upon that string; later, the third tone from the bottom of the lowest and of the next to the lowest tetrachords of the recognized system of tones. See lyre and tetrachord.

Lichanotinæ (lik″a-nō-tī'nē), n. pl. [NL., < Lichanotus + -inæ.] A subfamily of Lemuridæ: same as Indrisinæ. Also Lichanotina. J. E. Gray, 1825.

Lichanotus (lik-a-nō'tus), n. [NL. (Illiger, 1811).] A genus of lemurs: same as Indris.

liche[1]†, n. An assibilated form of like[1].

liche[2]†, a. An obsolete assibilated form of like[2].

lichee, n. See lichi.

lichen (lī'ken or lich'en), n. [= F. Pr. lichen ★= Sp. liquen = Pg. lichen = It. lichene, < L. lichen, < Gr. λειχήν, also λιχήν, a tree-moss, lichen, also a kind of liverwort, also an eruption on the skin, ringworm, tetter, perhaps < λείχειν, lick.] 1. In bot., a plant or vegetable growth

Lichens.
a, Cladonia pyxidata; b, Cetraria cucullata.

of the group Lichenes, ordinarily recognizable by its dry aspect and gray, brown, greenish, or blackish color, and its appearance in crusts, scaly patches, or bush-like forms on trees, rails, rocks, etc. Lichens also grow on the ground, and some (the Collemaceæ, or jelly-lichens) form, when wet, a pulpy or gelatinous mass. Lichens are distributed through all lands, enduring great extremes of temperature and the severest drought, living often where nothing else can. They corrode the hardest rocks, thus contributing to the formation of soil. The lichens most useful for food are the Iceland moss (see Cetraria), the reindeer-moss (see

Lichens.
c, Buellia geographica; d, Peltigera canina.

Cladonia and reindeer-moss), the manna-lichen (see Lecanora), and the rock-tripe (see Umbilicaria). Various lichens furnish the blue or purple dyestuffs known as archil, cudbear, and litmus. The Iceland moss has a demulcent worth; but for the most part the medicinal virtues of lichens are imaginary.

2. In pathol., an eruption of papules, of a red or pale color, which do not reach a vesicular or pustular stage. They may be in clusters or scattered, or disseminated over the surface of the skin; and may be attended with itching, as in lichen ruber, or may be quite free from it, as in lichen scrofulosorum.—Crab's-eye lichen, a name in the north of England for Lecanora pallescens, formerly used for dyeing.—Foliaceous lichen. See foliaceous.—Horsehair or horsetail lichen. See horsetail-lichen.—Wild lichen, a form of eczema.—Yellow wall-lichen (commonly wall-moss), Parmelia parietaria.

lichenaceous (lī-ke-nā'shius), a. [< lichen + -aceous.] Having the characters of a lichen; belonging to the Lichenaceæ or Lichenes.

lichened (lī'kend or lich'end), a. [< lichen + -ed[2].] Covered with lichens, or appearing as if so covered: as, a lichened wall; the lichened tree-toad, Trachycephalus lichenatus.

Lichenes (lī-kē'nēz), n. pl. [NL., pl. of L. lichen: see lichen.] A division of cellular, mostly thalloid, cryptogamic plants, formerly regarded as constituting a distinct class, but now, in accordance with the theory of Schwendener and others, considered to be genuine fungi of the divisions Ascomycetes and Basidiomycetes. They exhibit a remarkable parasitism. The host-plants are algæ, of a variety of genera, among which may be mentioned Cystococcus, Trentopohlia, Pleurococcus, and Dactylococcus of the grass-green algæ and Nostoc, Rivularia, and Glœocapsa of the blue-greens. Mycoidea frequently furnishes the host for Basidiolichenes. The algæ, which are also known in a free state and separate from the fungi, are embraced by the hyphæ of the lichen-fungus, and the two elements together compose a thallus of definite form. A transverse section of a lichen-thallus shows the hyphæ to be more or less closely interlaced about the algal cells or gonidia. This parasitism, which is without parallel in the animal kingdom or any other part of the vegetable kingdom, instead of resulting detrimentally to the algæ, incites them to more rapid activity and more vigorous increase. The reproduction is characteristic of the particular class to which the fungus belongs, and in a few lichens examined by Stahl there is an adaptation for the supply of algæ to the new lichen: algal cells, the offspring of the thallus-algæ (gonidia), are cast off along with the spores, so that the germ-tubes of the spores find suitable hosts at once. Propagation is also abundantly carried on by means of soredia, or brood-buds, which consist of one or more algal cells, surrounded by the fungus-hyphæ, which separate from the parent thallus. Lichens have been produced synthetically by Stahl and others by sowing the fungus-spores upon favorable algal cells, thus proving beyond question their dual nature. The older systematic lichenologists prefer to consider lichens as autonomous.

lichenian (lī-kē'ni-an), a. [< lichen + -ian.] Of or pertaining to lichens. Amer. Naturalist, XXIII. 5.

lichenic (lī-ken'ik), a. [< lichen + -ic.] Of or pertaining to or derived from lichens: as, lichenic acid.

lichenicolous (lī-ke-nik'ō-lus), a. [< L. lichen, a lichen, + colere, inhabit.] Parasitic on lichens. Micros. Science, XXX., Index, p. 42.

licheniform (lī'ken-i-fôrm), a. [< L. lichen, a lichen, + forma, form.] Resembling, or having the form of, a lichen; lichenoid.

Some of the inferior liverworts are quite licheniform, and are often mistaken for lichens.
H. Spencer, Prin. of Biol., § 186.

lichenin (lī'ken-in), n. [< lichen, q. v., + -in[2].] A variety of starch obtained from Iceland moss and many other varieties of lichens. It is insoluble in cold water, but forms a jelly with hot water. It is not turned blue by iodine.

lichenism (lī'ken-izm), n. [< lichen + -ism.] The habit of living in that union of fungus and alga which constitutes a lichen: a form of symbiosis.

It is moreover quite conceivable that there are species of Algæ which have become so adapted to lichenism that they can no longer attain their full development outside the Lichen-combination. De Bary, Fungi (trans.), p. 419.

lichenist (lī'ken-ist), n. [< lichen + -ist.] A lichenologist.

It is only within the last thirty years that it [the origin of the gonidia] has been investigated by lichenists.
Encyc. Brit., XIV. 556.

lichenographer (lī-ke-nog'ra-fėr), n. One who describes lichens; one who is versed in lichenography.

lichenographic (lī″ken-ō-graf'ik), a. [< lichenograph(y) + -ic.] Pertaining to lichenography.

lichenographical (lī″ken-ō-graf'i-kal), a. Same as lichenographic.

lichenographist (lī-ke-nog'ra-fist), n. [< lichenography + -ist.] Same as lichenographer.

lichenography (lī-ke-nog'ra-fi), n. [< Gr. λειχήν, a lichen, + -γραφία, < γράφειν, write.] A systematic treatment or description of lichens; the descriptive portion of lichenology.

lichenoid (lī'ken-oid), a. [< Gr. λειχήν, a lichen, + εἶδος, form.] In pathol. and bot., resembling lichen or a lichen; lichen-like; especially, in bot., resembling one of the foliaceous lichens; having a decumbent thallus, irregularly lobed.

lichenological (lī″ken-ō-loj'i-kal), a. [< lichenolog-y + -ic-al.] Of, pertaining, or relating to lichenology or the science of lichens.

From the time of Acharius, the father of lichenological science, different authors have proposed different classifications of lichens. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 560.

lichenologist (lī-ke-nol'ō-jist), n. [< lichenolog-y + -ist.] A specialist in lichenology; one who writes on the science of lichens.

lichenology (lī-ke-nol'ō-ji), n. [< Gr. λειχήν, a lichen, + -λογία, < λέγειν, speak: see -ology.] That department of botany which treats of lichens.

Lichenops (lī'ke-nops), n. [NL. (Commerson), < Gr. λειχήν, a tree-moss, lichen, + ὤψ, the face, countenance: see lichen.] A remarkable genus of South American clamatorial birds of the family Tyrannidæ, containing a single species of flycatchers called Ada commersoni by Lesson, and now known as Lichenops perspicillata.

lichenose (lī'ken-ōs or lich'en-ōs), a. [< lichen + -ose.] Having the characters of a lichen, or belonging to the Lichenes.

The simplest form under which lichenose vegetation occurs. Encyc. Brit., XIV. 552.

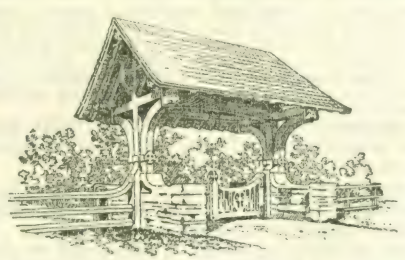
lichenous (lī'ken-us or lich'en-us), a. [< lichen + -ous.] 1. Relating to, resembling, abounding in, or covered with lichens.



An effect something like that of a fine flower against a lichenous branch. George Eliot, Daniel Deronda, xxxvi.

2. Pertaining to or of the nature of the disease called lichen: as, lichenous eruptions.

lichen-starch (lī'ken-stärch), n. A kind of starch associated with lichenin in Iceland moss.

lich-fowl (lich'foul), n. [Lit. 'corpse-fowl' (cf. equiv. G. leichhuhn); < lich[1], like[1], + fowl[1].] The night-jar or goatsucker, Caprimulgus europæus: so called from an old superstition.

lich-gate (lich'gāt), n. [< lich[1] + gate[1].] A churchyard gate with a porch or shed forming a chapel either combined with it or contiguous to it, in which in England and on the continent it was formerly customary, and is still usual in some places, for a bier to stand during the reading of the introductory part of the service, before it is borne inside; a corpse-gate. It is very commonly nothing more than a simple shed under which is the gate. Also spelled, archaically, lychgate.

Lich-gate.

Yet to the lychgate, where his chariot stood, lichi (lē-chē′), n. [Also litchi: Chin. li-chi.] A Chinese fruit, the product of the tree Litchi Chinensis (Nephelium Litchi). The most common variety is nearly round, about an inch and a half in diameter, with a thin and brittle red-colored shell, which is covered with wart-like protuberances. The pulp, when fresh, is white and nearly transparent, sweet and jelly-like, and contains a single shining brown seed. The fruit is borne in clusters. It is dried for preservation, the pulp shrinking away from the shell, and in this state it sometimes finds its way to western ports. See Litchi.
Strode from the porch. Tennyson, Aylmer's Field.

The lichi is the finest of Chinese fruits, having a white flesh with the taste of the best of grapes—excellent.
Pop. Sci. Mo., XXVIII. 574.

"Liar, liar, lick dish," a proverbial address to a liar, chiefly used at schools. It is an old saying, being found in the Tragedy of Hoffman, 1631, sig. I. ii. Halliwell.

licker (lik′ėr), n. [< ME. licker, likkare* (= OHG. lecchari, MHG. G. lecker); < lick + -er[1].] 1. One who licks or laps up.—2. One who beats. [Colloq.]—3. A device attached to a rotating or sliding part of an engine or other machine, for taking up a small quantity of oil and conveying it to a bearing or journal to be lubricated. The oil thus licked up may be presented to the licker in an open vessel, or in some absorbent material like flannel or sponge, with which the licker comes in contact at each revolution or reciprocation of the part which carries it; and the licker may act either on the principle of a scoop or by capillary action in conveying the oil to the bearing needing lubrication. Such lickers are now common in high-speed engines and other fast-running machines.

licker-in (lik′ėr-in′), n. The first roller-card of a carding-machine, which receives the lap or fleece from the feed-rolls, and delivers the fiber to the main carding-cylinder. The licker-in runs with less peripheral velocity than that of the main cylinder-card, hence the teeth of the latter continuously draw out or strip the fiber from the teeth of the licker-in as fast as it is received from the feed-rolls.

lickerish (lik′ėr-ish), a. [Formerly also liquorish; a corrupted form (as if < licker or liquor + -ish[1]) of lickerous: see lickerous.] 1. Same as lickerous, 1.—2. Same as lickerous, 2.

It is never tongue-tied when fit commendation, whereof womankind is so lickerish, is offered unto it. Sir P. Sidney.

Short Taste of Pleasures, how dost thou torment
A liquorish Soul, when once inflam'd by thee!
J. Beaumont, Psyche, iii. 1.

Their magazines are very often rifled by bears, raccoons, and such like liquorish vermin. Beverley, Virginia, ii. ¶ 18.

Like a spunge, you suck up lickerish wines.
Massinger, Virgin-Martyr, ii. 1.

Wouldst thou seek again to trap me here
With lickerish baits, fit to ensnare a brute?
Milton, Comus, l. 700.

lickerishly (lik′ėr-ish-li), adv. [Formerly also liquorishly; < lickerish + -ly[2]. Cf. lickerously.] In a lickerish manner; daintily.

lickerishness (lik′ėr-ish-nes), n. [Formerly also liquorishness; < lickerish + -ness. Cf. lickerousness.] The state or quality of being lickerish. (a) Niceness of palate; daintiness. (b) Eagerness; keen desire.

Lying to her dame in denying somewhat that in liquorishness she had taken away.
Winthrop, Hist. New England, II. 115.

The minds (or rather fancies) of men have such a naturall liquorishnesse after the knowledge of things strange and remote that they swallow nothing with so gratefull a gusto as stories of things rare and unusuall.
Bp. Parker, Platonick Philos., p. 82.

lickerous† (lik′ėr-us), a. [Also liquorous (simulating liquor), lickorous, licorous, also likresse, etc.; < ME. likerous, lykerous, likrus, < OF. likerous, lekerous, dainty (F. liqueroux, luscious, sweet), appar. an unassibilated form of lecherous* (> E. lecherous), dainty, wanton, cf. lekeor, leckeur, unassibilated forms of lecheor, lichieor, a glutton, lecher: see lecher, lecherous. Hence, by corruption, the later form lickerish.] 1. Nice or fastidious in taste; dainty.

Syn wemen are wilfull & there wit chaunges,
And so likrus of loue in likyng of yowthe,
This vnwarnes of wit wrixlis hys mynd.
Destruction of Troy (E. E. T. S.), l. 444.

Let not sir Surfet sitten at thi bord;
Loue him not, for he is a lechour and likerous of tonge.
Piers Plowman (A), vii. 253.

2. Having a keen relish; eager to taste or enjoy; keenly desirous.

Yonge clerkes that been lykerous
To reden artes that been curious.
Chaucer, Franklin's Tale, l. 391.

3. Sensual; luxurious; wanton; lecherous.

Lykerous folk, aftyr that they ben dede,
Schul whirle aboute the erthe, alwey in peyne,
Tyl manye a world be passed, out of drede,
And that forgevyn is here wickid dede.
Chaucer, Parliament of Fowls, l. 79.

lickerously† (lik′ėr-us-li), adv. [Also liquorously; < ME. likerously; < lickerous + -ly[2]. Hence, by corruption, lickerishly.] In a lickerous manner. Chaucer, Monk's Tale, l. 567.

lickerousness† (lik′ėr-us-nes), n. [Also liquorousness; < ME. likerousnesse; < lickerous + -ness. Hence, by corruption, lickerishness.] The state or quality of being lickerous. (a) Keen appetite; longing; gluttonous craving.

A theef of venysoun that hath forlaft
His likerousnesse and al his olde craft Kan kepe a forest best of any man.
Chaucer, Doctor's Tale, l. 84.

(b) Lasciviousness.

Venus me yaf my lust, my likerousnesse.
Chaucer, Prol. to Wife of Bath's Tale, l. 611.

licker-up (lik′ėr-up′), n. See the extract.

The die is usually made of cast steel. When it is placed upon the anvil, and the plated metal is cut into pieces of proper size, the top of the die is then surrounded with a lute, made of oil and clay, for an inch or two above its surface; and the cavity is filled with melted lead. The under face of the stamp-hammer has a plate of iron, called the licker-up, fitted into it, about the area of the die. Whenever the lead has become solid, the hammer is raised to a certain height, and dropped down upon it; and as the under face of the licker-up is made rough like a rasp, it firmly adheres to the lead, so as to lift it afterwards with the hammer. Ure, Dict., III. 583.

lickety-cut (lik′ę-ti-kut′), adv. [< lickety*, a vaguely imitative form based on lick, + cut.] Same as lickety-split.

So they went and pitched into the old chap, lickety-cut.

(Wagler, 1830), < Gr. λικμητός, a winnowing, < λικμᾶν, winnow, < λικμός, also λίκνον, a winnowing-fan.] A genus of slender-billed white Australian cockatoos, as L. tenuirostris and L. pastinator. They live on bulbs and roots which they dig out of the ground.

licorice, liquorice (lik′ọ-ris), n. [Formerly also lickorice, lickerice, licourize; < ME. licorice, licoris, lycorys, licoriz, etc., = D. lakkris, lakkeris = MLG. lackeritze = G. lakritze = Dan. Sw. lakrits, < OF. licorice, AF. lycorys, later liquerice; also, in other OF. forms, recalisse, recolice, regolice, regalisse, rigalisse, riglisse, etc., F. réglisse = Pr. regalicia, regulecia = Sp. regaliz, regaliza, regalicia = Pg. regaliz, regalice = It. regolizia, legorizia, liquirizia, < LL. liquiritia, ML. also liquiritium, corrupted from L. glycyrrhiza, < Gr. γλυκύρριζα, the licorice-plant, lit. 'sweet root,' < γλυκύς, sweet, + ῥίζα, root.] 1. A leguminous plant, Glycyrrhiza glabra, whose root yields the licorice of commerce. It is a perennial herbaceous plant growing 4 or 5 feet high, sparingly branched, with pinnate leaves and bluish pea-like flowers in spikes. The roots grow several feet long and an inch or more thick. Other plants of the genus are also called licorice.

In all thes for sayd yles ys growing wondyr myche licores, tyme, Sage, ffyggs, Oryges, Pomgarnetts, smale Reysyns, which we call Reyse of Corans.
Torkington, Diarie of Eng. Travell, p. 61.

2. An economic product, either the root of this plant or an extract from it. The former is called licorice-root or licorice; the latter is called stick-licorice, Spanish juice, or Italian extract of licorice, and is obtained by boiling the crushed root and evaporating the infusion, the residuum being rolled into sticks. The substance thus secured is dry and brittle, with a shining fracture, and when pure is entirely soluble in water, but is often grossly adulterated. Licorice is used medicinally chiefly as a demulcent, especially in bronchial affections. It is also employed in making confectionery, in brewing, and in the manufacture of tobacco. The extract is prepared extensively in Mediterranean Europe, and latterly in the United States from imported root.

But first he cheweth greyn and lycorys
To smellen sweete.
Chaucer, Miller's Tale, l. 504.

Indian licorice. See Abrus.—Prickly licorice, Glycyrrhiza echinata, whose pods are bristly and whose root is used like that of G. glabra.—Wild licorice. (a) Same as Indian licorice. (b) The plant also called rest-harrow, Ononis repens. Its root is used by children in place of licorice. [Prov. Eng.] (c) In America, a member of the true licorice genus, Glycyrrhiza lepidota, found chiefly far northwest; also, Galium circæzans and G. lanceolatum, on account of a sweetish root. (d) In Australia, Teucrium corymbosum, a sort of germander.

licourt, n. An obsolete form of liquor.

licourizet, n. An obsolete form of licorice.

lictor (lik′tọr), n. [L., an attendant on the Roman magistrates, perhaps lit. 'binder,' < ligare (√ lig), bind (with ref. to the fasces or 'bound' rods which they bore, or to binding culprits); otherwise < licere*, summon.] Among the ancient Romans, one of a number of officers, required to be free-born (though freedmen were admitted to the office under the empire), whose functions were to attend a magistrate, bearing the fasces, in some cases with the ax and in others without it, in order to clear the way and enforce due respect, and also to arrest offenders and to scourge or behead condemned persons. Magistrates were entitled to a number of lictors according to their rank, a dictator having twenty-four, a consul twelve, a pretor six (at first only two within the city walls), etc. The Flamen Dialis, or priest of Jupiter, and the Vestals also had lictors, but, it is believed, without fasces.

Lictors and rods, the ensigns of their power.
Milton, P. R., iv. 65.

Ho, trumpets, sound a war-note!
Ho, lictors, clear the way!
The Knights will ride, in all their pride,
Along the streets to-day.
Macaulay, Battle of Lake Regillus.

Licuala (lik-ū-ā′lą), n. [NL. (Rumphius, 1780), from the native Macassar name.] A genus of palms of the tribe Sabaleæ, distinguished by the terminal style, valvate corolla, and slightly coherent three-angled carpels. There are about 36 species, natives of tropical and eastern Asia, New Guinea, and northern Australia.

lid (lid), n. [< ME. lid, < AS. hlid (= OFries. hlid, lid = D. lid, lid, cover, = MLG. lide, way, passage, = OHG. hlit, lit, MHG. lit, G. lid (in comp. augenlid, augenlied, eyelid), a lid, cover, = Icel. hlidh, a gate, gateway, gap, breach, = Dan. Sw. led, wicket, gate), < hlīdan, pp. hliden, = OS. hlīdan = OFries. hlīdia, cover.] 1. A movable cover which closes an aperture or shuts in a cavity, and usually forms an integral part of the structure to which it belongs by being either attached or closely fitted to it: as, the lid of a tea-kettle, stove, chest, or desk.

My Lord, I broke my Glass that was in the Lid of my Snuff-box. Congreve, Double-Dealer, i. 5.

2. In bot., the upper section of a pyxis, which separates by a transverse line; also, the hood of the leaf in the pitcher-plants; in mosses, the operculum.—3. An eyelid.

The flame o' the taper
Bows toward her, and would under-peep her lids,
To see the enclosed lights. Shak., Cymbeline, ii. 2. 20.

4. In coal-mining, a short piece of timber placed on top of a prop to help in supporting the roof.—5. A coverlet. Halliwell. [Prov. Eng.]—6. One of the covers or boards of a book: as, everything between the lids of the Bible. [Colloq.]—Granular lids. See granular.—Port-lid, one of two shutters, upper and lower, which together close a port-hole. Each shutter has a semicircular piece cut out of it, so that together they fit round the gun. Also called half-port.

lid-cells (lid′selz), n. pl. In bot., the terminal cells of the neck of an archegonium of a cryptogam, closing for a time its canal. Also called stigmatic cells.

lidded (lid′ed), a. [< lid + *-ed*².] Having a lid; covered by a lid. In mining, the top of the bearing part of a pipe is said to be lidded when its usual space is contracted to a small compass or width. Halliwell.

The Persian girl alone,
Serene with argent-lidded eyes.
Tennyson, Arabian Nights.

One minute's while his eyes remained Half lidded, piteous, languid, innocent.
Keats, Cap and Bells, st. 20. (Davies.)

=Syn. Lie, Lay. "Lay is a transitive verb, and has for its preterit laid: as, he told me to lay it down, and I laid it down. Lie is intransitive, and has for its preterit lay: as, he told me to lie down, and I lay down. Some persons blunder by using laid for the preterit of lie: as, he told me to lie down, and I laid down. So persons often say, the ship laid at anchor; they laid by during the storm; the book laid on the shelf, etc. It is only necessary to remember, in all such cases that laid is the preterit of lay and not of lie. This would save many respectable writers from a gross error which seems to be increasing among us." (Goodrich.) Similarly, laid is often erroneously used for lain: as, I had laid down; and lain is sometimes used for ★laid.

lie[1] (lī), n. [< lie[1], v. Cf. lay[1], n.] 1. Manner of lying; relative direction, position, arrangement, etc. See lay[1], n., 4.

Sw. løgn = Goth. liugn, a lie (cf. lain[3]); from the verb: see lie[2], v.] 1. A false statement made with the purpose of deceiving; an intentional untruth; a falsehood; the utterance by speech or act of that which is false, with intent to mislead or delude.

Tell them that I will not come to-day:
Cannot, is false. . . . Shall Cæsar send a lie?
Shak., J. C., ii. 2. 65.

It is the wilful deceit that makes the lie; . . . a man may act a lie, as by pointing his finger in a wrong direction, when a traveller inquires of him his road.
Paley, Moral Philos., III. i. 15.

Guido pronounced the story one long lie.
Browning, Ring and Book, I. 119.

A lie which is half a truth is ever the blackest of lies.
Tennyson, The Grandmother.

2. That which is intended or serves to deceive or mislead; anything designed or adapted to produce false conclusions or expectations: as, this epitaph is a lie.

Sepulchral lies, our holy walls to grace.
Pope, Dunciad, i. 48.

Wishing this lie of life were o'er. Trench.

A lie out of whole cloth, a story or statement wholly fabricated; a tissue of falsehood, without any foundation in fact.—To give one the lie in his throat†. See give[1].—To give the lie to. See give[1].—White lie, a well-meant falsehood; a lie uttered without evil intent, or without expectation of harm, and so supposed to be excusable; a polite or conventional phrase not strictly in accordance with fact, and not meant to be understood literally.

Have you great heroic virtues?—no?—then remember Ananias and Sapphira. They died for a single White Lie, —a White Lie as common as dirt.

Cast in your nette: but be you liefe or lothe,
Hold you content as fortune list assyne.
Sir T. More, To them that seke Fortune.

To have as lief, to have liefer (had as lief, had liefer or liever). See explanation of these phrases under have.—To have lief† [= D. liefhebben = G. liebhaben, etc.], to hold dear; love.

"Hadde I hym nevere lief? By God, I wene Yet hadde I nevere thyng so lief!" quod she.
Chaucer, Troilus, iii. 869.

II.† n. One beloved; a darling.

Cryseyde, which that is thi lief,
Now loveth the as wel as thow dost hire.
Chaucer, Troilus, iv. 611.

lief (lēf), adv. [< lief, a.] Gladly; willingly. Lief is peculiarly used (originally an adjective) in the constructions to have as lief, to have liefer (had as lief, had liefer or liever), etc. See under have.

liefkin†, n. [Early mod. E. leefekyn, < MD. liefken (= G. liebchen); as lief + -kin.] Darling. Palsgrave, Acolastus.

liefsome† (lēf′sum), a. [Also dial. leesome, < ME. lēfsum (= OHG. liebsam); < lief + -some.] Agreeable.

So forth I goe apace to see that leefsome sight,
And with a kisse, methinke, I say, welcome my lord, my knight.
Surrey, Complaint of the Absence of her Louer.

lieftenant†, n. An obsolete form of lieutenant.

liege (lēj), a. and n. [< ME. lege, lige, lyge, liege, < OF. lige, liege = Pr. litge = It. ligio (ML. reflex ligius, legius), liege, free (AF. seignour lige, OF. lige seignur, liege lord, home lige, liege man, a liege lord being the lord of a free band, and his liege men privileged free men, bound to him, but free from other service, even that of their sovereign); < MHG. ledic, ledec, free, unhindered, empty, G. ledig, empty, vacant, = MLG. ledich, leddich = MD. ledich, idle, unemployed, = Icel. lidhugr, free, unhindered (not found in Goth.); prob. formed (as an adj. in -ig, E. *-y*1) on the noun remaining in ME. lethe, leisure, = MD. lede, in neg. unlede, business, trouble. Cf. AS. unlǣde = Goth. unlēds, poor, > unlēdi, poverty. The history of the word is incomplete.] I. a. 1. Free; specifically, free from obligation to service except as within the relations of lord and vassal: as, a liege lord, a liege man (correlative terms implying protection on the one side and service on the other, as against all other claims).

I schal loue him lelli as my lege brother.
William of Palerne (E. E. T. S.), l. 4128.

It hath pleased God to grant us a natural liege king and lord of our own nation.
Latimer, 1st Sermon bef. Edw. VI., 1549.

One would think that by this royal Patent, which gave him Power of Life and Death over the King's liege People, Sir W. Raleigh should become rectus in curia, and free from all old Convictions. Howell, Letters, ii. 61.

2. Of or pertaining to the tie reciprocally connecting vassal and chief: as, liege vassalage.—Liege homage. See homage.—Liege lord. See II., 2.—Liege man. See liegeman.

II. n. 1. A liegeman; a subject; a vassal; hence, a law-abiding citizen; a peaceably disposed person: as, to disturb the lieges.

The sowdan and his baronage
And alle his lieges shulde ycristned be.
Chaucer, Man of Law's Tale, l. 142.

"For kings, and all that are in authority," we may yet enlarge, and pray for peaceable reign, true lieges, strong armies. Jer. Taylor, Works (ed. 1835), i. 228.

2. A liege lord; one to whom another is bound in fealty or vassalage; a sovereign lord or feudal superior; a lord paramount.

Most mighty liege, and my companion peers.
Shak., Rich. II., i. 3. 93.

And glory to our sovereign liege, King Henry of Navarre.
Macaulay, Ivry.

liegedom (lēj′dum), n. [< liege + -dom.] Allegiance. [Rare.]

Sceptre, robe, and crown,
Liegedom and seignorie.
Scott, Bridal of Triermain, iii. 36.

liegeman (lēj′man), n.; pl. liegemen (-men). [< ME. lege man, leege man, orig. as two words: see liege and man.] A vassal; a subject; one bound to the service or support of a sovereign lord.

He moste thinke yt is his leege man,
And is his tresour, and his gold in cofre.
Chaucer, Good Women, l. 379.

You shall become true liegemen to his crown.
Shak., 1 Hen. VI., v. 4. 128.

liege-poustie (lēj′pous″ti), n. [< ME. (Sc.) liege poustee, < OF. liege poustee, free sovereignty: liege, free; poustie, < L. potesta(t-)s, power, sovereignty: see liege and poustie.] In Scots law, that state of health in which a person has full power to dispose, mortis causa or otherwise, of his heritable property.

lieger†, n. An obsolete form of *ledger*1.

lien1 (lī′en). An obsolete or archaic past participle of *lie*1.

lien2 (lē′en or lī′en, commonly lēn), n. [< F. lien, a band, tie, = Pg. ligamen, a hindrance, band (to marriage), = It. ligame, a band, tie, < L. ligamen, a band, < ligare, bind, tie: see ligament.] 1. In law: (a) The right of a person having possession of the property of another to retain it until some charge upon it or some demand due him is satisfied; the right to enforce a charge upon a specific thing by withholding possession from the owner until the charge is satisfied. A particular lien is a right to retain a thing for some charge or claim growing out of the identical thing or connected with it; a general lien is a right to retain the thing for a general balance either of all accounts between the parties, without restriction, or of accounts of like transactions, or in the same line of business. At common law possession was essential to the existence of a lien; courts of equity extended the doctrine. Hence—(b) A right of a creditor to have a debt or charge satisfied by legal proceedings out of specific property or its proceeds, irrespective of having possession. Often called an equitable lien. Maritime liens, the creation of courts of admiralty, are also independent of possession. So are mechanics' liens, given by statute to mechanics, etc., for unpaid labor, on real property. See below.

Hence—2. A claim; occasion of demand; right to compensation.

The slightest thing will serve, in Italy, for a lien upon your exchequer. T. B. Aldrich, Ponkapog to Pesth, p. 44.

Attorney's lien, the right of an attorney, which was established on equitable principles by the courts, and extended in some jurisdictions by statute, to have his compensation satisfied out of the cause of action or the judgment recovered by him, or by retaining his client's papers, even if this prevented his client from compromising and settling with the adversary.—Charging lien, the right of an attorney to have a lien created or declared as a charge upon a fund not in his possession, or upon a judgment or decree recovered by him.—Lien de droit, in French law, obligation; nexus.—Mechanic's lien, a lien on real property, given by statutes in most of the United States, to mechanics and material-men, for the price or value of improvements supplied by them, even though not contracted for directly by the owner. Two systems exist: in one (of which the law of New York is an example) the subcontractors and material-men are subrogated to the claim of the contractor against the owner, and may charge the land with liens up to the amount due from the owner to the contractor; in the other system (of which the Pennsylvania law is a leading example), the subcontractors and material-men are given a lien to the amount of what they have furnished, irrespective of the state of the accounts between the owner and the contractor, the theory of the law being that the contractor is the owner's agent for the purpose of employing labor and material.—Retaining lien, the right of an attorney to retain papers in his possession belonging to a client until his claim against the client for services has been satisfied.—Specific lien, a lien secured by a contract or a judgment, execution, attachment, or other legal proceeding, fastening it on a specific thing.—Vendor's liens, a class of equitable liens arising where a seller conveys land without being paid the price or taking security, and is allowed to have the land resold to raise it.

lien3 (lī′en), n.; pl. lienes (lī′e-nēz). [L.] The spleen. [Rare.]

lienculus (lī-eng′kū-lus), n.; pl. lienculi (-lī). [NL., dim. of L. lien, the spleen: see *lien*3.] One of the small separate masses of splenic tissue sometimes found about the spleen.

lift[1] (lift), n. [< ME. lift, luft, lyft, < AS. lyft = OS. luft = D. lucht = MLG. lucht, luft, LG. luft = OHG. MHG. G. luft = Icel. lopt (pron. loft) = Dan. Sw. luft = Goth. luftus, the air, the sky: the orig. Teut. word for 'air,' and not found outside of Teut. Hence, through Scand., lift[2], loft, lofty, aloft, etc.] The air; the atmosphere; the sky; the heavens. [Now only prov. Eng. and Scotch.]

When the lift grew dark, and the wind blew loud,
And gurly grew the sea.
Sir Patrick Spens (Child's Ballads, III. 154).

It is the moon, I ken her horn,
That's blinkin' in the lift sae hie.
Burns, Oh, Willie Brew'd a Peck o' Maut.

★ lift[2] (lift), v. [< ME. liften, lyften (pret. lift, lyft), < Icel. lypta (pron. lyfta) (= Sw. lyfta = Dan. löfte, lift, MHG. G. lüften), lift, air, lit. 'raise in air,' < lopt (pron. loft) = Sw. Dan. luft = MHG. G. luft = AS. lyft, lift, the air: see lift[1].] I. trans. 1. To move or heave upward in space; bring to a higher place or position; raise; elevate: often followed by up: as, to lift a stone from the ground: to lift up one who has fallen.

Whan he was upon his Coursere, and wente to the Castelle, and entred in to the Cave, the Dragoun lifte up hire Hed azenst him. Mandeville, Travels, p. 24.

He lift up his spear against eight hundred.
2 Sam. xxiii. 8.

He rises on the toe; that spirit of his
In aspiration lifts him from the earth.
Shak., T. and C., iv. 5. 16.

2. To bring to a higher degree, rank, or condition; make more lofty or considerable; elevate; exalt; raise to a high or a higher pitch or state of feeling, as the voice, the mind, etc.

In those means which he [God] by law did establish as being fittest unto that end, for us to alter any thing is to lift up ourselves against God, and as it were to countermand him. Hooker, Eccles. Polity, iii. 10.

His [Joseph's] envious brethrens treacherous drift Him to the Stern of Memphian State had lift.
Sylvester, tr. of Du Bartas's Weeks, i. 7.

And Jacob . . . lifted up his voice, and wept.
Gen. xxix. 11.

Lifted at length, by dignity of thought
And dint of genius, to an affluent lot.
Cowper, Table-Talk, l. 676.

I remember Penn before his accusers, and Fox in the bail dock, where he was lifted up in spirit, as he tells us, and the Judge and the Jury became as dead men under his feet. Lamb, Elia, p. 54.

3. To keep elevated or exalted; hold up; display on high: as, the mountain lifts its head above the clouds.

We saw
The long-roofed chapel of King's College lift
Turrets and pinnacles in answering files.
Wordsworth, Prelude, iii.

And, in dark firmaments of leaves,
The orange lifts its golden moons.
Lowell, An Invitation.

Lyft that swanne. Babees Book (E. E. T. S.), p. 265.

8†. To bear; support.

So downe he fell, that th' earth him underneath
Did grone, as feeble so great load to lift.
Spenser, F. Q., I. xi. 54.

9. In golf, to take (a ball) out of a hazard and drop or tee it in conformity with the rules.—To lift one's graith. See graith.—To lift one's hair, to scalp one. [Slang, western U. S.]—To lift the crib, in the Great Lakes fisheries, to gather in the netting of a crib or bowl of a pound-net; haul the pound, as would be said in New England.—To lift up the eyes, to look; raise the eyes; direct one's eyes, or, figuratively, one's thoughts.

I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help. Ps. cxxi. 1.

To lift up the head, to rejoice or exult.

Then look up, and lift up your heads; for your redemption draweth nigh. Luke xxi. 28.

To lift up the horn, in Scrip., to vaunt one's self; behave arrogantly.

I said unto the fools, Deal not foolishly; and to the wicked, Lift not up the horn. Ps. lxxv. 4.

= Syn. 1 and 2. Hoist, Heave, etc. See raise.

II. intrans. 1. To raise or endeavor to raise something; exert the strength for the purpose of raising something.

The mind, by being engaged in a task beyond its strength, like the body strained by lifting at a weight too heavy, has often its force broken. Locke.

2. To rise or seem to rise; disappear in the air: as, the fog lifts.

No gladlier does the stranded wreck
See thro' the gray skirts of a lifting squall
The boat that bears the hope of life approach.
Tennyson, Enoch Arden.

3. Naut., to shake lightly in the wind: said of a sail when the wind blows on its edge at too small an angle to fill it.—To lift for dealing, in ★card-playing, to draw or cut for deal. Halliwell.

lift[2] (lift), n. [< lift[2], v.] 1. The act or manner of lifting or raising; a raising or rising up; elevation.

In races it is not the large stride or high lift that makes the speed. Bacon, Dispatch (ed. 1887).

A lift of the fog favored us at last, and we ran into the little harbor. B. Taylor, Northern Travel, p. 15.

Paris had received one of those momentary lifts of which she went through several before her final exaltation.
E. A. Freeman, Venice, p. 8.

Some boughs of the maples were beginning to lose the elastic upward lift of their prime, and to hang looser and limper with the burden of their foliage.
Howells, Annie Kilburn, xv.

2. Assistance by, or by means of, lifting; hence, assistance in general; a helping hand: as, to give one a lift (a help on one's way) in a wagon.

Much watching of Louisa, and much subsequent observation of her impenetrable demeanour, which keenly whetted and sharpened Mrs. Sparsit's edge, must have given her, as it were, a lift in the way of inspiration.
Dickens, Hard Times, ii. 10.

A lady in a dog-cart warned us of rain, and offered us a lift, which we refused heroically.
Harper's Mag., LXXVII. 945.

3. A rise; degree of elevation; extent of rise, or distance through which anything is raised.

All of these valves have cages in which they work and which also act as stops, which prevent them from rising from their seats further than a certain distance. This distance is called their lift, and the successful working of the pumps depends very much on the amount of lift which the valves have. Forney, Locomotive, p. 117.

Here and there in the land were sharp lifts where rocks cropped out, making miniature cliffs overhanging some portions of the brook's course. The Century, XXXI. 108.

Specifically—(a) The extent of rise in a canal-lock: as, a lift of ten feet. (b) In mining: (1) The distance from one level to another. (2) The distance through which the pestle of an ore-stamp rises and falls.

4. A rise in state or condition; promotion; advancement: as, to get a lift in the army for bravery.—5. Elevation of style or sentiment; action of lifting or elevating, as the mind. [Rare.]

The voice of the orator ceased, and there was perfect silence. It seemed as if it could never be broken. The lift was altogether too great for immediate applause.
Josiah Quincy, Figures of the Past, p. 109.

6. Anything which assists in lifting, or by which objects are lifted. Specifically—(a) A hoisting-machine or other device for raising or lowering persons or things vertically from a lower to a higher level or vice versa. (See elevator, 4.) A lift in a canal is a large machine-elevator sometimes used instead of a lock.

The Times establishment is altogether too conservative to introduce elevators except in their publication department, where the lifts are employed for carrying the forms up and down and for similar heavy work.
T. C. Crawford, English Life, p. 110.

An elaborate arrangement of lifts by which actors can suddenly appear or vanish through the stage floor.
Encyc. Brit., XXIII. 225.

(b) In mining, a set of pumps.

The separate pumps in an engine-shaft are placed one above another; each set constitutes a lift, and the water is raised from the sump or fork to the surface by several repetitions of the same process.
Callon, Lectures on Mining (tr. Le Neve Foster and Galloway), II. 350.

(c) A handle, knob, or other device attached to windows and window-blinds to afford a hold in raising or lowering them. Car-Builder's Dict. (d) One of the steps or grooves of a cone-pulley. The speed of the hoist is varied by changing the belt from lift to lift. (e) The long stock or rod of a deep well-pump. (f) In a ship's rigging, one of the ropes connecting the ends of a yard with a masthead or cap. By means of such ropes the yards are squared or trimmed — that is, brought into and held in a position at right angles with the mast. (g) A machine for exercising the body by the act of lifting. Also called lifting-machine and health-lift. (h) In a lathe and in other machine-tools, any one of the ledges, flats, or grooves on or in the periphery of the headstock-pulley, and of a similar pulley of the shaft or countershaft from which power is taken. These lifts are so proportioned and arranged that shifting the belt from a lift of a given diameter to one of a smaller diameter on the headstock-pulley compels it to be also shifted from a lift of smaller to one of larger diameter on the countershaft-pulley. Thus several definite changes of speed of rotation may be obtained with the same belt. 7. That which is lifted or is to be lifted. Specifically — (a) A weight to be raised: as, a heavy lift. (b) A gate without hinges, which must be lifted up in order to remove or open it. In some parts of England and the United States the projecting ends of the bars are let into mortise-holes in the posts, into and out of which the gate must be lifted. Also called lift-gate, lifting-gate. 8. In a boot or shoe, one of the thicknesses of leather which are pegged together to form the heel; a heel-lift.—Dead lift. (a) A lift made in the most difficult circumstances, as of a dead body; a direct lift without the assistance of leverage or any other mechanical appliance. (b) A last resort; a desperate emergency.

> The physician
> Helps ever at a dead lift.
> Beau. and Fl., Thierry and Theodoret, ii. 1.

Here is some of Hannibal's medicine he carried always in the pommel of his sword, for a dead lift.
Shirley, Maid's Revenge, iii. 2.

On the lift, on the point of leaving; ready to depart; in a figurative sense, at the point of death. [Southern U. S.]

I can conceive of but one extenuation. Bolus was on the lift for Texas, and the desire was natural to qualify himself for citizenship. Flush Times of Alabama.

De ole ox is done took sick, and is on de lift.
C. D. Warner, Harper's Mag., LXXVI. 486.

Topping-lift (naut.), a rope used to support or raise the outer end of a spanker-boom or a lower studdingsail-boom.

lift[3] (lift), v. [Commonly supposed to be ult. akin to Goth. hlifan, steal (> hliftus, a thief), = L. clepere = Gr. κλέπ-τ-ειν (aor. pass. κλαπῆναι), steal (see cleptomania, klepht). But the word is not found in this sense in ME. or AS., and this fact and the associations of the word make it clear that lift[3], remove, take away, steal, is simply a use of lift[2], raise: see lift[2].] I. trans. To remove surreptitiously; take and carry away; steal; purloin: as, to lift cattle.

Common thief! . . . No such thing; Donald Bean Lean never lifted less than a drove in his life; . . . he that lifts a drove from a Sassenach laird is a gentleman drover.
